

Post Inaugural Observations From the UK and a Journey through Middle Earth

From news reports, both mainstream and alternative; to media personalities, friendships, and family relationships, they have all undergone a litmus test of being very confusing and troubling seasons of who to trust and mis-trust, in a rapid and on-going succession through different world events which has exposed the deepest corruption imaginable.

Was the 4th July 2024 – The UK's Independence Day?

I'm not quite sure why former UK Prime Minister, Rushi Sunak decided to hold the General Election on the 4th July this year. He must have surely known that his party, the so-called Conservatives, didn't stand for liberation, and they certainly didn't stand any chance this time around of winning. Everyone knew that after their 14 years of continual oppression, betrayal and lies, winning the General Election wasn't even an option.

The reality of life on the streets of the UK is entirely different to how it once was. There is nothing to hide behind. Many people are afraid to walk the streets of towns and cities in the UK which have become unrecognisable. They are afraid to go to their doctors and hospitals' and they do not like what their children are being exposed to in schools and via the media.

Remembering the Fallen: UK – November 2023

Remembering the Fallen, might be an invitation to not only be silent in remembrance of others, past and present, but to silently look inward to our own fallen selves. An opportunity to see what it is that others use to trigger our resentment with the injustice that we see all around us and to see how we are being used again to fight each other. A return back to the place where we all fell.

Climate Change in the United Kingdom

We should be in no doubt that we are in a final war with evil. It is cunning and sly and comes as an angel of light pretending to care about people's health and the environment, but it can only use these issues together with those who align to it, for its own selfish advantage and agenda. There is an awful lot of cruelty and horror taking place in this beautiful world.

The Coronation in the UK

I believe that the overwhelming feeling of oppression which was reported by many people on the 6th May was the opposite of what this simple message of Hope conveyed. In one space and in this one moment of time there was a collective gathering, many of whom have pledged an allegiance to a One World Order...

The City of Dreaming Spires, 15-minute Cities and Life in your Open Prison

In Oxford, in the UK which is known for its prestigious Universities, and is labelled the City of Dreaming Spires, there has been much anguish over the implementation of something called 15 minutes cities and the impact this will have upon residents and the businesses who pay local council taxes to the City Council.

UK Politician, Matt Hancock, Seeks to Make Amends, and A Christian Perspective on Forgiving and Forgetting

My instinct in answering the question at the time, was to apply it to human nature, and to state that they can, no matter what their personality has been perceived to be. There is always the possibility that despite being a certain type of person, people can, and do indeed change for the better.

The Death of Queen Elizabeth II

The last two and a half years should have revealed to everyone how we are disrespected and hated. Children and Adults died completely alone. Dedicated nurses were threatened and persecuted with the loss of a job for not being vaccinated. People were blackmailed and bribed into medical interventions which have now been proven to not be at all safe.

Guilty Secrets and the Fall of the National Health Service in the UK

Because of this, many have distanced themselves. They have jumped ship from the National Health Service. It is my personal belief it was that they have been unable to take the injustice and no longer feel motivated by the system they have been loyally serving.

A Stand in the Park: Resistance in the UK for 2022

On this occasion I was not going to listen to the usual brass band which would sometimes leisurely play there, but I was there to meet a group of complete strangers who have been meeting each Sunday morning in parks across the UK and around the world, to stand up peaceably for freedom, jobs, small businesses, against lockdowns, harmful laws and against people behind 'The Great Reset'.

Humanity – Our Heart Is Still Beating – The UK in 2021

Refuse to become isolated and used against each other, but accept that there is a natural separation taking place and you will have to let people go their own way. In biblical terms it is called separating the wheat from the chaff.

Marks of Respect in the UK for the Duke of Edinburgh and the Loss of Respect for Good Friday

There is a massive divide in the UK between people who trust establishments and those who don't. There are those who want to hang on to the image of 'royalty' and some sense of superiority, but there is a now also a population who know about elite globalists, their agenda's, their coldness and their incessant lies.

The UK and the London Mayor

There's a super smart man who is currently driving around the streets of London at the moment. He is tall, motivated and extremely brave. He is an entrepreneur and knows how to get things done. He is clean shaven, wears very snazzy Saville Row suits with a bright red tie, and what's more he's American.

The UK, Beyond 2020 and Brexit – Does a Light Still Shine?

The Psychological Attack which is being carried out upon the citizens of the UK, is dark, cruel and manipulative. After weeks of a complete lockdown in society, with a one-day reprieve for good behavior on Christmas Day, and with no hope of a release until Spring; a deep sense of despair is affecting many.

Veterans in UK Told to Stay Away From the Cenotaph

If the British public are still under any type of illusion that their government cares about their well-being or the sacrifices that they have made to protect this country during the year 2020, and all previous times in history, where men have lost their lives in honest physical and treacherous battles, all for the sake of others; then the populace well and truly have become friends with an enemy that hides behind a mask of deceit.

Resistance to the New Abnormal in the UK – Maintaining and Reclaiming Your Identity

Remember who you are, return to who you really are, and remember what love really is. Listen to your heart and the still small voice inside. It will never leave you or abuse you. Your face, your identity, your voice and your life are important aspects of your 'being. You should be free to discover who you are. Don't let others dictate who that is. Do not accept abnormality as normality.

Resistance and Rebellion in the UK – Where are the Men?

With voices being silenced from singing in church together with mandatory mask wearing for church goers, the conformity and the absence of any enthusiasm or bravery towards this oppression from most churches, whilst in the same are as there are open restaurants, café's and pubs, unfortunately denotes a certain weakness which is not inspiring.

Is Wearing Face Masks A Pre-Cursor To A Cashless Society?

Together with various members of the Conservative Party, who have publicly ripped up their membership cards in disagreement with the ruling, many other people across the country have seriously questioned the decision on why this requirement would be enforced now, in the middle of summer, and four months after the initial lockdown?

UK Perspective on Covid 19 – Subliminal Programming or Propaganda

I believe people are waking up to the psychological manipulation which has been taking place upon them and many are turning back to God and praying. We look often to the USA where our founding fathers travelled to in an escape from persecution to our relatives who also love the freedom upon which the country was built.

Betrayal and Programming

behind Covid 19 – A UK Perspective, Part 3

Those who believe in culling the nation and who think they are superior and do not really value human life, no longer have to make their intentions more widely known. World wars do not have to be created to get rid of men, although civil wars can be useful. Psychological warfare and race relation wars can be created from afar so that men can destroy each other instead. This is currently being played out now.

The Betrayal and the Programming behind Covid 19 – A UK Perspective, Part 2

My views are that a quick return to normal and not a 'new normal' would be needed. However, sadly, even then there would never be the same trust. Civilizations are usually completely broken down so that they can be built up in a different way and too much damage has been done.

Betrayal and the Programming

Behind Covid 19 – A UK Perspective

You see the battle between fact and fiction, reality and lies, in relation to Covid 19, are currently coexisting in a parallel world right now. However, I sense storm clouds are gathering; and the stoic British pride of working together during a national crisis may just be about to turn a bit nasty if certain 'other' truths should ever get openly reported.

BREXIT, COVID-19 and Life in Britain

All the same, echo's of the past and of history and of hardships are also a warning too. Faith, at the expense of not warning others, or not learning from history, damages others. Reliable watchmen are needed.

This Week In The UK – Truth Is Still Being Crucified

For some reason, despite this re-assurance, and my not even knowing this particular advocate, I unfortunately still don't trust the process which may possibly be giving me the illusion that anyone may be interested in my own particular concerns which span the course of 50 plus years.

The Rape of Men – Sinaga, Jezebel and the Feminists

The emphasis on the rape of men in all its many forms, without the mention of the rape of women, will reveal an annoyance in many people's minds, but it shouldn't. Equality needs revising. It should be a catalyst to show that hatred is really at the root cause of all of our problems.

Britain Get Talking

The horror of how mankind is encouraged to destroy itself and how we are subjected to silence about that injustice through social manipulation, is perhaps our greatest shame of all; but all is not lost. Urgent action is needed. Our hope is a reconnection from the place where we fell. Restoration is possible.

Stories of Unspeakable Evil,

Holocaust and Eternal Hope

I witnessed how the battle between good and evil is continuing taking place and how eugenics, euthanasia, and abortion, which are all trade marks of evil and are symbolic of ethnic cleansing are increasingly being promoted quite openly.

The Decline of the Church of England And The Rise of Babel

My own impressions were that the helter-skelter reminded me of the image of the Tower of Babel, and the foolishness of a materialistic attempt to reach God.

Maximum Security Prison For Harmless Tommy Robinson

He has stepped outside the box and spoken up for the silenced in the same way that the Brexit party spoke up for the majority of knowledgeable and insightful people in the UK who felt betrayed by our government.

Donald Trump, Tea Rooms and Treason

If President Trump was on his very best behaviour and in awe of the royal family, as reported by a very biased media, than Piers Morgan had been equally cordial, later publicly thanking him that he had agreed to the interview, and also pointing out the misdemeanour's of a previous president, namely President William Jefferson Clinton, whilst actually still in office. I had literally wanted to cheer when he brought up the obvious.

How Naturalism, Gender Identity And Pornography Are Inexplicably Entwined

The Problem with Choice

Choice without consequence is as old as the planet, and should be as obvious to the educationalist, the theorist, the scientist, and the humanist, as it is to those with just good old fashioned common sense. We can't have the freedom to choose without accepting responsibility and also accountability on the outcome of our choices.

From even the smallest choice like the clothes we wear, to the food we eat, down to where we choose to go on holiday, each and every action we take has an outcome.

Unfortunately, in our fallen states of being, our choices are not always the wisest. Temptation, selfishness, lust, and also a sense of entitlement (resentment) are a contributing factor which is also embedded in our psyche.

Therefore it stands to reason that the choices we make can harm or heal us.

'Normalizing' or 'Glamorizing' choices which obviously have the potential to seriously hurt people, and even drive them to suicide, has become a very fashionable new trend in presenting lifestyles to adults and more seriously to the next generation, our children. Where does our responsibility lie?

A new law which could come into effect in 2020 can rule that primary school children in the UK, aged from 4 upwards must be taught a positive view of non-traditional "families", same-sex relationships and transsexual identities. The teaching will come under 'Relationship Studies' and would be a mandatory part of the school curriculum, instead of 'Sex Education', from which parents can presently opt their children out of.

Recently, it was reported that up to 600 parents in Birmingham, UK, kept their children from school in a demonstration against relationship studies and a programme called 'No Outsiders' There was an emphasis on the demonstrators being 'Muslim'. However, concerned parents across the country have been petitioning the Lords Committee expressing their alarm at the deceptive legislation which will remove the parent's choice for their child's education in nursery school.

The 'No Outsiders' programme which was developed and created by Andrew Moffatt who is the Assistant Head Teacher at Parkfield Community School, is a range of 35 (picture) books covering race, religion, gender, age, disabilities, sexual orientation, marriage/civil partnership and pregnancy/maternity.

♣ Muslim and Christian parents withdraw children from UK school in protest over LGBT content

♣ There is never a reason for bigotry at the school gates

Kenan Malik, an Observer columnist in an article printed in the Guardian attacked two issues with just one stone by labelling the demonstration as bigoted and likening it to a Tommy Robinson event spewing hatred, except it was Muslim parents spewing hatred towards gay relationships!

Whilst there is a very obvious pushback taking place within our schools against the indoctrination and the mandatory teaching of gender issues as being lifestyles to very young children, unfortunately there are now a few other new kids on the block waiting to join forces, which are subtly and not so modestly intent on mutilating the truly natural potential of creation.

Do you have Gymnophobia

Next month, families in the UK, are being invited again to a nude family fun event at Waterworld Aqua Park, Stoke on Trent. The British Naturist Society who have advertised their event as being open to members and non members, and to all adults and children of any age are charging £21 for adult non members, £5 for children. Under fives go free.

Whilst petitions against the events are also taking place around the country at similar venues, in relation to exposing children to adult nudity, the British Naturist Society who claim that they take their safeguarding and health and safety precautions seriously, still advertise that they exist to unite and support naturists, to protect naturist places and make social nudity more acceptable across the UK.

But naturist family events at public leisure centres are not the only places where nudity is becoming socially acceptable.

The infamous Channel 4 network in the UK which often crosses the boundaries of decency have been airing 'literally', a dating programme called Naked Attraction, where people looking for love choose their date not by viewing their face or getting to know the personality of someone they may be attracted to; but by choosing a partner from how they look in their 'birthday suit'. The programme is at least honest if not shallow, in contrast to naturists who claim they are more interested in each others minds, rather than the obvious nudity of the strangers they may mix with.

In 2017, Paris also opened its first ever naked restaurant called 'Au Naturel' indicating that the drive by Naturist societies to make nudity more acceptable in the mainstream is 'happening'.

Another popular Channel 4 TV programme which also crosses the boundaries of decency is The Sex Clinic where young and 'active' people are filmed being intimately investigated for transmitted sexual diseases. The trailers to the programme are presented in a light hearted way in bright colourful clinics with attractive doctors. The most recent episode was advertised as:

"Emily requests an STI test to make sure her hook-up isn't cheating. Leticia seeks advice on bipolar and sex. And a male stripper has a rash down below"[\[Link\]](#)

Dr Naomi Sutton, known as Dr Naomi in the programme hopes to de-stigmatise attitudes towards sexual health and promote healthier attitudes; but whilst her work as a Consultant Physician in Integrated Sexual Health at The Rotherham NHS Foundation Trust is valuable in helping under 16's, trafficked women and victims of sexual assault, one cannot help but wonder what happened to the healthier attitudes we once highly held before sexual behaviour was de-stigmatised and anything goes attitude replaced them, leading to the increase in sexually transmitted diseases which medicine now has to treat. [\[Link\]](#)

It is reported that the sexual health crisis in the UK with syphilis and gonorrhoea on the increase, is all due to government funding being withdrawn year upon year towards funding sexual health services.

National Aids Trust chief executive Deborah Gold added

"This government is presiding over a national crisis in sexual health, caused in large part by the decision to implement year-on-year cuts to the public health grant which funds sexual health services," The impact of these cuts is being felt disproportionately by people in black and minority ethnicity (BME) communities, young people, and men who have sex with men – a group which accounts for 78 per cent of the new syphilis cases.

That is an interesting statement which you currently could not put pictures of in a 4 year olds book.

The Dark Web

Marketers of course know that the successful selling of any product is always reliant on the visuals. With the dark web becoming more accessible to younger people and with a reported 30,000 cases reported in the UK over the last 4 years of children carrying out sexual assaults against other children, because they think it is normal, some of which were carried out on school premises, indicates not only are children becoming more readily exposed to pornography but they are receiving confusing information about sex from schools who promote lifestyle choices without consequences regardless of their age. The word 'porn' is also becoming fashionably used by adults as a term to describe desires for such things as food and items of clothing. Shoe porn is not an uncommon term for women to use who have a fetish for shoes. The difference however is that porn is violent and an insult to sex, men and women, and should never be normalized in this way.

Fight the new Drug, is a website which explains the addictiveness of porn illustrating how it affects the brain, affects relationships, and affects society. Shockingly, it also states that Porn hub received 33.5 billion site visits last year, surely indicating that adults have very little willpower over their choices once they are hooked upon watching such disturbing images. It should be a national shame that our children are also hooked upon these sites with their interest and intrigue in sex being introduced to them at younger and younger ages.

What is really natural?

It seems sad that the world can take what is truly natural and beautiful and alter it. Even a beautiful display of flowers once connected and fed by the earth loses its life force once they are cut and arranged and displaying by human hands.

Naturists, who up until now have kept their love of being naked predominately to private beaches, are not always natural people in the truest sense of what that means. In creative terms, and not evolutionary terms, in our fallen state a wonderful gift of modesty was given to us that would never allow us to expose ourselves to un-consenting adults, and definitely never to children. It is why it is against the law, and indecent exposure is listed under the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Are our concepts now being 'toyed' with?

Read the story of Alfie Moore, a detective who was with Humberside Police and who writes about his life as a police officer and dealing with people who commit indecent exposure over a period of 18 years: [Eighteen years as a police officer: I know indecent exposure isn't taken seriously]

Choice, that word, that gift, that curse, that we have and don't take responsibility for, is being given to children as young as four years old in schools. Children at Water World Aqua Park will see men and women who are strangers naked – and this is being portrayed as natural? Children with same sex attraction and gender related issues are sadly also not been given the correct information. Are they all being used?

The Emperor's New Clothes

The Emperors New Clothes is a more realistic children's story on how we can all be taken in by swindlers. Pretending to weave the finest cloth which could only be seen by the elite and not by anyone else including people considered stupid, a suit which doesn't even exist is sold to the emperor. Parading the streets in his nudity, and his ugliness, and not wishing to offend him, his public congratulate him on his beautiful new suit.

A child who did not see it necessary to pretend or offend anyone shouts "But he has nothing on" bursting the bubble of pretence until all the onlookers repeat what the child has said. The emperor continues attempting to maintain dignity as though nothing has happened. Who is the fool?

Telling children what is acceptable and that they can choose what they do with their bodies at any age is happening to younger and younger children. What is the real agenda behind the visuals and the information that adults are feeding them, and how are we complicit in the next stage of sexualizing children?

While You Were Sleeping

Last Sunday, I distinctly heard the church bells ringing in the distance. They seemed much louder than usual, and appeared to possess an almost eerie request to their appeal. Maybe, it was the silence in my own home that was emphasizing their tone; they certainly evoked a remembrance of a past life of my time working in the Anglican Church, yet they also definitely had an air of present day danger and warning in their message.

But as I wondered how many people were listening to the sounds of the environment we lived in, I also thought of those who were sleeping through a familiar message which was continually being relayed.

It seemed a somewhat sad parody, that an establishment which was meant to be offering hope in a sick and confused world, where an imminent danger was fully present and no longer hiding, was for the most part offering the same methodical system of control and adherence to the standards of the world within its walls. Is it an unforgivable sickness that you can feel good within religious surroundings yet befriend the wolves who are stalking the aisles alongside you?

Later that week as I pressed the buttons of Control, Alter and Delete to enter a system on my keyboard at my place of work, the production of the Parish Magazine and my typing of the Hatch, Match and Despatch page came to mind. Remembering the parish office bought back the pleasant smells of old oak wood furniture, and freshly cut flowers. I had once felt safe there. I thought about the new babies who I would announce in the pages of that magazine, full of hope and optimism; the careful handwriting and the accuracy I would have to use in the recording of the marriages in a large official journal, and the detailing of the deaths which had happened in the parish, also recording the road where they had once resided. There was one road in particular where deaths were frequent because of the age of the residents who lived there. One cynical clergyman labelled it 'Death Row'. I vowed I would never want to move there.

As I pondered on the reason and the purpose of life on earth, realizing that there were so many unanswered questions, and probably thousands of lies which I probably still believed myself, it was difficult not to question why some people just aren't bothered.

People are born, and they die, and they seldom question why!

And then there are those who are now questioning all of the systems in society, as it becomes glaringly obvious that they are completely corrupted and broken down. Many of them are young people. They are hatched, matched and not quite despatched at the moment. Some have not quite succumbed to the indoctrination of school and media lies and are truly unique individuals, who are made to feel like outcasts in our diverse society which boasts of equality.

They question why politicians continually lie to us, and why people are dying at an unbelievable rate from illnesses which are outnumbering the millions of pounds being ploughed into researching their cause, knowing full well that our food, water and air is being poisoned. They wonder why there are an increasing number of people who are sleeping on the streets of our cities and why people who do not love this country are being subsidized with homes and an income? They question their student debt? They question the re-writing of history. The list is endless, but there is something sadly missing.

Blaming it all on God, no longer cuts it. They now know that something else is orchestrating it all. The internet whilst corruptible, also presently provides a source of answers, which can confirm the reason why they are not quite going along with the crowd who see nothing wrong or deeply contrived about the lives we are living.

Is this where people go now to find out the answers and to discuss their concerns? How do they counteract the spiritual sickness and the acute aloneness which can arise when churches, family and friends will not discuss such issues and wish only to adhere to a false love being offered, minus any real discernment, which is really a pre-cursor to accepting a one world religion and belief system.

Many church goers now want more than just a compromise and the false unity. How can we deal with the resentment that arises and also honestly discuss the spiritual battles which can also reside within us too when there is a lazy boy attitude which refuses to acknowledge that something is seriously wrong with our world?

As evil steps up the game, at a relentless ugly pace, and dark forces surround the earth, you need a strong and solid faith in justice and that which is noble and pure, other wise you just won't make it out of the negativity which is enshrouding the planet. You must love the truth, more than you love a feel good message and have a belief that genuine good always overcomes evil. Is this the essence of true faith?

Is there a way to find joy and peace in your heart whilst witnessing lies and exposing them?

A Big Beautiful Wall

Richard Gamble, a former football chaplain in the UK, is one person who believes discussing prayer is the impetus to get people talking about Jesus, and he aims to build an architectural monument/sculpture alongside a busy motorway in the UK, consisting of a million donated bricks which will cost £10 each.

He is quoted as saying "I'm going to get Christians from all over the UK to buy a brick and tell us what prayer God has answered for them".

Known as The Wall of Prayer, it should be a timely reminder that we have had so much to be thankful for during many times in our English history and also in our own personal lives, however at the time of his proposal he could never have known that a future president of the United States of America would also have plans to promote the building of the wall across the Mexico-Texas border to protect Americans.

The wall in the UK, which does not have the same high degree of media attention, has now become a multi-cultural appeal with donations accepted from around the world!

The website of The Wall also states that the bricks will not be engraved and will also remain anonymous, but when a light is shone on an individual brick it will relay the prayer of that person to your phone. This indicates there will be some sort of digital device inserted in each brick. Work aims to be started on the monument in 2020 and you can read about it here and view the various designs of the wall which are currently being submitted: <https://thewall.org.uk/>

It certainly appears to be a noble effort in acknowledging thankfulness, that a monument can be attributed to the Christian faith which may remind people that the good things about this country were built upon the foundations of Christian principles, yet the question remains “what is our own individual character and what are our principles built upon, are they solid, and have we allowed wrong thinking and actions to infiltrate and distort them?”

An inward enquiry through stillness in the storms that we are going through may give us some clearer insight that we need balance and focus to remain connected to God.

There, it should be confirmed that the truth once written on tablets of stone are actually invisibly written and engraved upon your heart. Silent prayer can shine a light upon them.

Whilst others are sleeping, and wolves are prowling the streets and the aisles, we should wake up early and find him. The bible promises that God does not slumber or sleep.

The building of the wall in America is to protect the heart of America and its people from those who don't honour its citizens and principles. Someone who respects you does not force their way into your home.

Re-writing History

Britain has not only forgotten its spiritual foundations it has forgotten its heritage even though it is all around us. The country has hundreds of castles, moats and viewing towers to remind us of a history of invasion from the Romans, the Anglo-Saxons and Normans and why we needed to build walls. From the office where I once worked I also had views of what is called Beacons which stretch across the country and were once used to emit light or smoke to ships and planes, or else to warn citizens of impending danger. Whilst people were sleeping there would possibly be watchmen looking out for such signals.

We also have a very famous wall called Hadrian's Wall built by Emperor Hadrian in 122 AD who built the wall to protect Roman Britain from Scotland.

It seems strange that the English Heritage website for Hadrian's Wall states as one of its key facts on its home page:

- Many soldiers and civilians travelled great distances to reach the Wall, including people from modern-day Syria, Romania and North Africa [Link]

It is also interesting that Hadrian's Wall known as a UNESCO site (United Nations, Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) from its website is celebrating LGBTQ in history along with the National Trust who are an environmental and heritage conservation charity in England. The website states:

- The Emperor Hadrian was gay. He was married to the Empress Vibia Sabina, but also famously had a male lover Antinoos. Antinoos drowned in the Nile. There are several theories as to exactly how and why he died, but one thing is certain, Hadrian mourned his death like no other. [Link]

Indeed, there are now new Untold History package tours which focus on the sexuality of famous people entering all tourist industries, Quiikys being one of most known tour operators in Italy which advertises its tours as “based on the classic exploration of historical cultural heritage not forgetting its usually omitted gay side”.

In conclusion, for those searching for spiritual answers, regardless of who they are, it was whilst we were sleeping that Cultural Marxism crept in. It is one of the root causes of the infiltration into almost everything which is distracting people away from the truth, and it is something to individually protect your heart and mind against if we don't want to end up controlled, altered and deleted.

Death Row should never be our option.....

We Are Reaping The Seeds Of Destruction For Tolerating Evil For Decades

Sowing the Seeds of Confusion

The English scientist and astronomer Sir Isaac Newton, after losing his fortune on the stock market, said "I can calculate the movement of the stars but not the madness of men".

How right he was, and how refreshing to come across a smart man of his day allude to the fact that the intellect, and in this case, his intellect, does not always get it right.

These days, and 294 years later, not only the stock market, but the madness of men is still pretty much subject to the ups and downs of fashionable trends, even though there may be a certain trusted psychology to being a wise investor of money. However, gambling or taking a calculated risk on the stock market is often given much more consideration than the chances that we take in putting our lives in the hands of 'some' experts in relation to mental health.

With a very large drive in the UK to de-stigmatize people with mental health problems and also raise the awareness of our own mental health, the drive to talk about our feelings can have both positive and negative consequences.

Talking to a trusted person, who is not afraid to tell you the truth and has a high degree of understanding to extend to you, can sometimes be the catalyst that you need to step out of any place of confusion and darkness.

However, whilst acknowledging we have certain thoughts and feelings, which are creating confusion, there is now an array of labels which can be extremely sticky and very hard to shake off once they are attached to you.

Indeed, the wrong suggestion or advice given to anyone in a vulnerable state has consequences, and can also literally destroy someone, and that is one particular problem that no-one ever wants to talk about.

Today, whilst our homes, our schools and our workplaces, are being forcibly subjected to the marketing of extremely liberal ideals, at every twist and turn, generations of confused and hurting people now seek help from a system that has also played some part in disabling them. Isn't that crazy?

We have gone along with the fatherless, humanist, 'do as you like' new world creation of liberty, which is really a form of slavery, and now there is an agenda which wants to make your children, the next generation, more promiscuous, genderless or confused about their identity. I think I'd label that 'Evil'

Whilst therapists certainly differ on their viewpoints, and are at odds with the drive to indoctrinate children on sexual values, whilst they are young and impressionable, and within a school environment of authority, the influence still 'grows'.

It is determined and indifferent to any rationale.

It is now recorded that the number of children under 10 years of age referred to Identity Clinics in the UK, in the last 5 years has quadrupled. Children can be referred by a GP or a child and adult mental health service.

Whilst former advisor to the Department of Education says "it has become an industry and people are making a career out of encouraging children to question gender at an age when they need to left to be children”, in response Dr Polly Carmichael, a leading NHS psychologist has defended the teaching of transgender issues in schools, stating “It is good that schools are putting it on the agenda. It can never be negative if schools are being thoughtful and offering opportunities to discuss topical issues”

Number children referred gender identity clinics has quadrupled

Heavers Farm Primary School in South London is one such school which claims it is proud to produce thoughtful and well rounded young people, without really knowing the consequences of their actions which will affect some of their pupils when they reach puberty and adulthood.

Education or Indoctrination

Earlier this year it is alleged that children as young as five were forced to take part in a gay pride event and that no opt-out would be allowed. It is reported some concerned parents labelled ‘Christian’, as though it were an illness, who confronted the head teacher were reportedly met by a staff member with a tee-shirt which read: Why be Racist, Sexist, Homophobic or Transphobic, when you could just be quiet! The statement shows a complete lack of consideration and respect to any parent who is concerned about their children but is the arrogant response that people who are conveying common-sense are often met with, regardless of the words being displayed on a tee-shirt. It is now reported that it is the parents at this particular school who are feeling victimized in relation to the incident.

Already, the labelling of people who hold traditional or common sense values has seen them ridiculed, outcast and stigmatized for holding on to their particular belief system.

For interested parties, the freedom of religion as set out in Articles 9 and 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights are protected in the Human Rights Act 1998. Under English Law you have a protected right that your beliefs are respected. Under protocol 1, Art 2 of the European Convention, parents have the right their child is educated in line with their religious beliefs, so you are therefore entitled to object to the promotion of promiscuity or indoctrination on the grounds that it conflicts with your faith.

Prayer alert pray for parents meeting with school over LGBT promotion

Yet, whilst fashionable new British values are encouraging children to question whether they are really a boy or a girl, adults are also being routinely questioned on their mental health status at every available opportunity. If you happen to visit a doctor with a bout of the flu or any minor ailment you can also find yourself being questioned on your mental health.

Mental Health First Aid courses are also springing up all around the country and anyone can attend a course. The aim is to recognise the signs of early mental health problems and encourage your friend, co-worker, or family member to seek help from an expert. MHFA claims to have trained 330,000 people over the last 10 years and it is part of a global endeavour to educate people in mental health. In terms of recognizing certain signs in children and young adults; in the not too distant future will they be the new watchmen perceiving signs of gender dysphasia within our schools?

The Tavistock and Portman NHS Foundation Trust in London, is one of many hospitals promoting the Mental Health First Aid course. It is also the home of the Gender Identity Clinic who were accused of 'fast tracking' children into life altering decisions without fully assessing their personal histories! It is reported that criticisms of their practises saw divided families who did not fully support their recommendations labelled as 'Negative'.

One can only wonder how people now facing the new normal ideals being practised in some areas of psychiatry, who object in any way, survive the anguish of seeing the truth trampled upon. In many cases they are made to feel guilty for not encouraging or supporting their child down the route of transitioning to another sex.

It is also reported that one school in England, believed to be in the Midlands has 17 pupils transitioning after one of the pupils transitioned and has now planned a double mastectomy, aiming to now be a non-binary person. A whistleblower from the school exposed the story after regretting going along with guidelines set out on how to treat children who want to identify as non-binary or transfer their sex. She stated that the majority of the children are 'autistic' and have been groomed by older children to believe they want to change sex.

Where did it all start and where will it all end?

Strangely enough, Sir Isaac Newton was believed to have had his own mental health issues despite him being a genius. It is claimed he had a manic depressive disorder, and amongst other depressive episodes, at one point suffered a breakdown. Some say his troubled upbringing together with the absence of a father and mother may have played a part in his depression, although upon his death, large traces of mercury were also found in his system, possibly ingested in his experimentation into alchemy.

Today, we are similarly saddled with broken and fatherless homes, we are exposed to various toxins in the food, water and in the air we breathe; our children are obsessed with new technology which we encourage rather than them being outside in the streets subject to drug pushers and crime, like it is the lesser of two evils. As a result, sex, crime, violence and pornography are also secretly on the daily menu of the computer or the play station in many children's bedrooms. Hope in a Creator and a healthy and fulfilling life has all but been crushed. Free speech, individual and creative skills are stamped out to favour group think (together we are one) in a new world that is displacing all that was once promising.

Depressing isn't it?

When seeking counsel, great discernment is always needed. For believers, and searchers, a return to the garden where we once sat, free from indoctrination and the poisons which society feeds us is at the heart of living a free and purposeful life. Expert counsel exists there. It is a place where some people yearn to be. Nothing else will suffice. Be aware that in that garden seeds of confusion have always been sown; be alert, but when still, clarity and clear vision can definitely be restored.

The laws of the universe are written in your heart. We should stick to them. Forgiveness and the giving up of our anger can resurrect even the most damaged cells of our bodies.

Our natures sometimes only want the advice that we want to hear. But God's wisdom and his counsel is always for our good health and to have a sound clear mind.....

About the times of the End, a body of men will be raised up who will turn their attention to the prophecies, and insist upon their literal interpretation, in the midst of much clamour and opposition." – Sir Isaac Newton

100 Years of Conflict 1918 – 2018

Memorial sites, like graveyards, can sometimes be extremely cold places. A small stone plaque with an etched name and a date of birth and death can hardly seem to do justice at times to a life which has touched this earth, and then swiftly left. And then, there are those places where the reality of death as a result of war hits home, and other people's lives can become real and very relevant in your life today.

Such was my revisit last month to Alrewas, in Lichfield, and the National Memorial Arboretum which houses one of the largest memorial sites in the UK dedicated to all branches of the armed forces, and those organizations who are connected to them.

You can read the full list of memorials here: [Link 1] and [Link 2]

This time around there was also an exhibition which thoughtfully and audibly recounted the life stories of some of the lives of those who had died or been injured in serving their country. Images of transparent falling autumn leaves continually transposed themselves over the walls and floors of the museum. As you walked around and looked into the eyes of those living and departed, and listened to the accounts of what life was really like and how it is presently experienced in various war zones across the world today, you received a much better understanding. It was however a mixture of emotion and reality, and was something to be cautious of.

There was a large mural which covered one wall and which, from a distance, looked like a forest of tall straight trees; but when you looked closely it was made up of thousands of faces of people who had died, together with the faces of their friends and families. They are the faces of people from all walks of life and religion. It was also like looking through a matrix, a magic eye, with the truth disguised behind an image.

The staff and the volunteers make sure that every guest is welcomed with care and sensitivity and directed to the appropriate location they wish to visit. Some visitors are parents or relatives of young men and women who have recently died fighting in conflict. They come bringing wreathes of red poppies.

The arboretum is an ongoing work in progress as it continually records and etches the names of young men and women who have passed on.

One new memorial that I noticed was one commemorating the destruction of the Twin Towers and was dedicated to those who have died through acts of terrorism. The memorial looked very small in relation to the other memorials and I remembered how the towers had once stood so tall against the skyline in New York City.

Another new memorial is called 'Still Water' and is dedicated to British victims of overseas terrorism. I thought about the 30 British holidaymakers in Tunisia who were gunned down in 2015 by Islamist gunman Seifeddine Rezgui. Three of the dead were personally known by a work colleague of mine. Yes, the reality of terrorism had certainly come close to home. There are a growing number of people in the UK who now know someone who has been attacked through an act of terrorism.

On leaving the arboretum I also passed through the book shop and noticed one solitary book on the top shelf all alone in the corner. On the cover of the book was the face of Fusilier Lee Rigsby who was murdered in 2013 whilst off duty. In a London street he had been intentionally run over and then butchered to death. His murder was reported as being carried out by Islamic extremists, Michael Adebolajo and his accomplice Michael Adebowale.

In 2015, Adebolajo, sentenced to 45 years, attempted to claim compensation of £20,000 after he lost two teeth in a scuffle at the prison.

I wondered if the solitary book was there because people had continually been purchasing it, or if the book was there all alone because people were avoiding it.

The more popular books being purchased were about life during the two World Wars. My own thoughts are that there is a certain comfort in remembering the togetherness and the unity that people experienced during World War I and II. Despite its obvious horrors, people were also more sure they knew who the enemy was and what they were fighting for.

Later that evening, as I happened to listen upon a speech being made by Prime Minister, Theresa May at the UN General Assembly in New York, I watched her stand in front of a stone cold marble wall so similar to the ones I had seen that day, and I listened with a strange irony to how she stated in one sentence how we should support freedom of expression and a free and open media, and then on the other hand how we should call out those who have hate speech, most especially in relation to all forms of anti-Semitism and Islamophobia.

A small dagger pierced my heart. There was some hatred in her words that ignored the truly noble and the most vulnerable of people.

The dedication that was so solemnly being made, offered truth, but with certain clauses. It appeared to be a weak attempt at appearing strong, and by holding up Islamophobia alongside anti-Semitism it conveyed that together these were the most two persecuted groups in the United Kingdom. It also offered some advantage because of recent allegations made against her own party and the opposing Labour party in the UK who have been accused of anti-Semitism. It was using political correctness to your own advantage.

Phobia

According to Meriam Webster Dictionary the word phobia first came into print in 1786, along with such words as disorderly conduct, idealize, imposing, Masonic, uncaring and self-respecting. Phobia is understood to be a logical or illogical strong dislike or fear of someone or something. Many of us have a dislike of something, like spiders or heights. When is a dislike deemed logical or illogical and subsequently a phobia? Does over-exposure to the dislike cure a person of their fear?

Islamophobia, a word which first came into print in 1923, is listed thousands of times on the internet and hatred towards Muslims is considered to be a very real and threatening problem. Could it ever be sensibly suggested that based on the facts of attacks being made on the streets of Europe against innocent civilians that people have a dislike, and also a logical fear towards Islam because it is linked to terrorism and brutality without it being labelled a phobia? What is the motive behind people using this term, and why does the Prime Minister now continually favor its use in her speeches?

This year The Muslim Council of Britain wrote to Theresa May urging her to launch an enquiry into Conservative Party Islamophobia. This was due to former London mayor and foreign secretary Boris Johnson publicly making derogatory remarks about the Burka which were subsequently considered as dehumanizing Muslim women. [Link]

One could say 'never mind' that the current London mayor, Sadiq Khan, saw no problem in allowing some very dehumanizing images of President Donald Trump to be flown during his recent visit to the UK. However, in fairness he did condemn recent anti-Semitic posters which appeared across London, labeling them offensive.

What is happening in the United Kingdom is people are becoming exposed to a religion, which regardless of its link to terrorism is not prepared to accept any type of humor or criticism that can be happily directed towards other groups in the country. There is indeed a fear of reprisals. In this respect it is at odds against our true values of free speech and openness. A certain respect is being demanded, and a certain secret impatience is admittedly growing.

The prime minister was fueling the flames of this particular division.

Who is truly, noble, pure and righteous?

For the believer, the answer is no-one other than Jesus Christ, who is also the defender of the most weak and vulnerable in society, including unborn children. I have always loved that he is the defender of the widow and the orphan. War leaves lots of widows and orphans. Yet believers themselves are these days compromising with lots of immoral laws which are being implemented within society. Being labelled conservative or liberal does not necessarily let you know who is right or wrong either and it does not put you on the right hand side of God. These days politics appears to be, as some say, two wings of the same bird.

My trip to Alrewas, was however revealing. Somewhere in that mural, in that matrix which was made up of thousands of faces from various cultures and religions lay some true heroism. As in life, the truth is chiselled in some people's hearts and knowing who is who is not always an easy matter.

With Remembrance Day this year commemorating 100 years since the First World War, we will indeed remember them, how can we forget? Yet, since time has begun, there has been conflict. There is an enmity between those who love the truth and those who don't. There has always been a spiritual battle, and for some reason it seems to be coming to an ultimate conclusion.

Yearning for the truth, has become a matter of life and death. Where will you stand, and how will you be remembered?

The Spineless Church Of

United Kingdom And The Bright Lights Of Malvern

Every now and then I take to escaping my urban environment to try and search for pastures new, and the other week I happened to drop in and visit Malvern Priory.

Set in the Malvern Hills it sits high above the surrounding landscape bordering the counties of Worcestershire, Herefordshire and Gloucestershire.

Fortunately for me, when I entered the priory there were very few people inside. No men in frocks, no rituals taking place; just a few people casually walking round and looking at the memorials and the stained glass windows.

After a while I sat quietly away from everyone. Outside of the obvious show of religion I did sense some stability and comfort in the place. There was a certain peace from being set apart from the outside world of chaos. Here, people had come for many years to try and make a connection with something, someone, a deity, outside of themselves. Did they find their heaven?

Some say that the Christian author, C.S. Lewis based his book The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, from experiences he had in Malvern.

There is a small plaque indicating that suggestion next to a door at the back of the priory which resembles the wardrobe door from his book. From where I sat, if left ajar, you would certainly be able to view one of the many lamps which line the streets, which also featured in his writing.

However, it is also reported that one night after leaving the local pub in Malvern he caught sight of a lamp shining in the newly fallen snow which caught his attention and it was this sight that took him to that other place; a land called Narnia – A world within a world where spiritual battles between good and evil existed. Was C S Lewis drunk on drowning his sorrows, or was he really gaining some insight and a glimpse into what happens when you truly search for meaning.

The door reminded me of one of my own experiences that took me away from organized religion, and why I have found my search for a world inside a world a very narrow path.

One day in a crowded church I noticed that the room got very dark but no-one else seemed to notice. As I turned to look at the back of the church I realized that the door was slightly open. There was a bright light in the door which conveyed to me without words to get out of there, otherwise the door would be shut forever. The experience was so powerful that I have always remembered it. What did it mean? There was an obvious message that existed in the light against the darkness which moved me.

The author J. R. R. Tolkien, a friend of C S Lewis and author of the Lord of the Rings, had also walked the hills of Malvern. In conjunction with his catholic faith he too, somehow conveyed the battle for Middle Earth, which could possibly represent England, as a fight between good and evil, light and dark, in his writings. Although both authors are considered fantasy writers, who focus on mythical creatures which include wizards, hobbits, and dragon slayers, their stories resonate quite strongly for many believers and also non believers who realize they are in a battle for their land and a spiritual battle for their sanity and their souls. There is an enemy which is ruthless.

Why isn't the present day church as a whole in the United Kingdom preaching about the spiritual battles in our land? In general, so few will speak about Islam, (not Aslan) which may displace Christianity in the future, they do not talk about politics and laws being passed which affect culture, and they also do not talk about the consequences of sin or forgiveness.

It appears that some preachers believe our battle against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world and against the spiritual wickedness in high places (authorities) are indeed either myths or parables from the past or best left to a few activists on the street who are much more able to take the strikes of saying it how it is.

Recently, former Archbishop of Canterbury Lord George Carey was accused of failing to act on sexual abuse claims against another bishop, Peter Ball, who was jailed for abusing 18 young men over a period of 30 years.

It is alleged he said "the church is sometimes "behind the curve" when it comes to addressing allegations of abuse, and that nobody had access to child protection training during a "pre-Savile era" [Link]

Historical sex abuse that exists within religion is unfortunately widespread, and has been for many years, but why would an Archbishop who should realize the reality of the battle between good and evil ever be surprised or rely on child protection training when faced with allegations from parents and victims of their abuse?

It seems conditional that there is a certain loyalty to protect each other amongst the priesthood. However, some clergy will often resign or retire early through indiscretions. In recent years though there have been many public exits from staff who cannot and will not compromise upon their beliefs within the changing face of the Anglican Church.

Lorna Ashworth resigned from the Archbishops Council and General Synod in 2017. In her resignation letter according to Church Times she stated that she refused to be mistaken as one participating in the fanciful notion of “good disagreement”.

Evangelist Rico Tice resigned from the Archbishops Taskforce on Evangelism over the compromises being made under the leadership of Bishop Paul Bayes of Liverpool on same sex marriage. He stated:

‘I think it is a great wickedness to tell people who are on the road to destruction that they are not. To tell them that they are safe when it comes to God’s wrath when they are not.’

You can listen to his statement here.

Between Lambs and Lions

UK film producer, Mark Sutherland who was recently interviewed by Coach Dave Daubenmire of Pass the Salt Ministries was also asked what the church is like in the UK today. He was very aware of the obvious lack of strength and spiritual battles we face.

It was a revelation and a relief to hear him clearly echo the observations made by other people in the UK who have also lost faith in the Anglican Church and see it as a very weak establishment today which is not standing up for the truth.

During the interview, a 10 minute film entitled Between Lambs and Lions, which Mark produced is also shown, it is prophetic to America, although relevant to what we see happening in the world today and is described as being a vision of the future where leaders pay lip service to the democratic process. It was filmed in 2015. You can watch the film via either of the links below:

<https://coachdavelive.com/>

<https://vimeo.com/132138043>

There are some excellent lines in this short film:

"Truth is treason in the empire of lies"

"If Liberty means anything it means the right to tell people what they don't want to hear"

"Vultures don't circle around anything unless it is dead"

From the viewpoint of standing in a country where the truth is no longer respected, yet amidst a growing crowd of followers in the Evangelical and Pentecostal movements, many people have stated that really it is only a remnant of people across this country who are now still standing firm. I would hasten to add many of these are not outwardly religious people but they are standing in the gap and exposing some of the great injustices taking place within society.

Indeed a lady who wrote to me from Yorkshire in England told me that she had also left the church; and had once saw the whole of the UK as being covered by a large dark cloud. However, now she can see pinpoints of light emerging out of that darkness exposing the truth. Many of them are the most unlikely of people. I see it too. This is encouraging. The vultures are circling, but there is still some truth emerging in this empire of lies.

The Ring of Power

On a final note, the late author, Stratford Caldecott, was also someone who wrote about darkness and light and interpreted The Lord of the Ring in theological terms. He wrote:

"The Ring of Power exemplifies the dark magic of the corrupted will, the assertion of self in disobedience to God. It appears to give freedom, but its true function is to enslave the wearer to the Fallen Angel. It corrodes the human will of the wearer, rendering him increasingly 'thin' and unreal; indeed, its gift of invisibility symbolizes this ability to destroy all natural human relationships and identity. You could say the Ring is sin itself: tempting and seemingly harmless to begin with, increasingly hard to give up and corrupting in the long run.

That is a sad but realistic account of how a whole country can become enslaved and corroded whilst thinking it is free. Human relationships and identity are certainly under attack.

The light is still shining, it is but a flicker in the UK, but will we step out into the battle and confront evil, even though it sometimes feels like you are standing alone, whilst not losing faith?

Dare Speak The Truth And Arrogant UK Authorities Want Your Flesh

The release on bail of Tommy Robinson, the man who was swiftly arrested, sentenced and jailed for 13 months, for reporting on rape gangs which had been freely operating for many years across the UK, see my article from June, brought a very welcome sigh of relief for the many people who had been supporting his cause against an unfair trial and imprisonment.

However, the exposure of the totalitarian manner in which he was treated, whilst reporting on a case which had already been reported in the public domain, and now the apparent consequences of him being locked in solitary confinement in the second prison to where he was moved, HMP Onley Prison, Rugby, appears to reveal a cruelty which seems to outweigh the consequences of his misdemeanour and his conviction. What exactly is going on?

In the following days of his arrest; after the deed had been done, and the reporting restrictions lifted; not only the mainstream media, but legal professionals from every corner of the globe appeared to come out of the woodwork and take great pleasure and a deep sense of superiority in pointing out and justifying the 'real' reasons why Robinson had been locked up.

Justice, they believed, was rightly being served up upon a man who they considered a 'trouble maker' a 'bigot', a 'thug' a 'nazi' and a whole list of abbreviated adjectives which you would normally attach to a crook who had possibly raped and passed around your daughter. There was indignation towards a man, who albeit slightly irresponsible at times that displayed a hatred which surpassed normal rationality. Why was that? [Tommy Robinson bailed after Court of Appeal win]

If you have been watching the shift from mutually trusting and respecting another's views to the outright violence and intolerance now being displayed by mainly liberal minded people towards those who see things differently, you will notice that there is very little tolerance being shown towards their fellow human beings, even if that person is presenting some very obvious facts.

Now they live under the premise that if they are offended by your difference of opinion, you are often sued, arrested and made to suffer unmercifully.

Aside from Tommy Robinson who voluntarily reports primarily on Islam, the UK is awash with ordinary people, who living upon the principles of their own conscience and conviction, and are not physically hurting anyone else, are being dragged often intentionally into law cases because the accuser's feelings have been offended.

Consider just a few of these cases:

Michael Jones was charged with two counts of religiously aggravated offense for comments he made whilst open-air preaching in Beverley, near Hull. Michael denied both counts. (the offence – comments)

Victoria Wasteney, a senior NHS occupational therapist was suspended for nine months after giving a Christian book to a Muslim colleague. (the offence – passing on a book)

Christian worker, Nohad Halawi, was sacked from her job at London's Heathrow Airport after false rumors that she was "anti-Islam". (the offence – not liking another religion)

Gary McFarlane, a relationship counselor from Bristol, was dismissed for gross misconduct by Relate after he refused to confirm that he would provide directive sex therapy to homosexual couples due to his religious beliefs. (the offence – conviction of his own beliefs)

Shirley Chaplin, an NHS nurse, was faced with disciplinary action after being told that she was no longer permitted to wear her cross while at work on health and safety grounds. (the offence – wearing a piece of jewellery – the cross being offensive)

A Christian couple were told they could not adopt their two foster children, because of their "concerning" views that the children needed a mother and father. (the offence – having traditional values)

Vicky Allen is a teaching assistant who was disciplined for answering a student's question on same-sex relationships. (the offence – honestly answering a question) [Link]

If anyone wants to criticize their religious convictions then they are free to do so; but no one above was inciting violence or causing physical harm. Imprisoning them and punishing someone based on someone else being 'offended' comes from an arrogant spirit which has no tolerance.

As the world slips further into extreme decadence and poverty, both financially and morally, wrong minded people will still demand they are creating some sort of utopia in this world whilst right minded people are thwarting their plans, and must be silenced and stopped at any cost.

The evidence of an out of control section of society which pouts, uses emotion/tears or out-screams another when another's views are unfashionable or unfavourable to their own is becoming more and more prevalent. Unfortunately, we are witnessing more and more people in positions of authority who are stepping outside a legal framework and punishing others with their own biased views as well. This is being witnessed not only in law, but within education and health. Biased laws which disrespect the rights of a parent and also a patient are now being put in place to silence any opposition.

Does this stem from 'common purpose' values which promote leading outside of authority?

People are becoming afraid and do not trust the health system, the law system, or the education system any longer in the UK.

A spiritual battle, which some might say is between the 'wheat and tares' or the 'truth and the lies' of this world might be at the root cause of this conflict. The similarities in the silencing of speech, which are occurring across the world, can be of no coincidence.

Certainly, there is now aggressiveness and arrogance in some people which want to see you suffer unmercifully for any slight against them, or their cherished views.

Sometimes, in their presence, you can witness a smile which tries to hide when you relay a tragedy or a mishap which has befallen you.

Some people will silently delight at your mistakes; a past slip of the tongue or a small indiscretion is ammunition to be taken down and used against you as evidence in case you should ever start to shine. Watch out too for those who use the misdemeanours of your relatives against you. A wrong minded person will never view you as an individual in your own right in the present day, but they will take every piece of dirt they can find to sling it at you to justify their own sense of rightness, even when they are wrong.

They are also experts at projecting their own flaws against you.

So, who and what is the beast we are dealing with?

The injustice that Tommy Robinson has suffered which you can view in the video from an interview with Tucker Carlson reveals a spirit which is intent on destroying people, and was intent on destroying him. You will sense and see some stress and confusion in the interview, which is the result of his solitary confinement and the effects that injustice has on people. It is quite disturbing to watch.

No doubt there will be people who still feel after watching this video he still got what he deserved, and some will say he is an attention seeker.

My own thoughts are that if you want some attention there are plenty of ways to get it other than risking your life to expose this kind of truth in today's environment. Tommy Robinson is worn out but he is not down and he is certainly no coward.

In the interview Carlson makes the statement that the United Kingdom is but a mere shadow of the nation which gave the United States its freedom of speech Freedom of Speech is worth fighting for. Regardless if you like or hate the man he didn't deserve this.

Now we hear the ordeal is not over for Tommy. There is going to be a re-trial next month and so the possibility of him being locked up again could be a possibility.

What is happening is that a big heavy show of silencing people (in other words this man is also being used as a scapegoat) is happening rather than a show being made of the true offenders of the whole incident, which are the men, accused of gang raping children. Going after the minor offender and making a show of it is a distraction for showing muscle in the face of your own cowardice. Human rights for one but never for another.

These actions should seriously concern anyone who loves justice for in reality he should be compensated and not punished further.

It's a sad day for justice in the UK.

The UK Is Leading The Way In The 'Absolute' Loss Of Moral Values And Faith

Many British people, concerned about the state of our nation, mistakenly believe that it is the United States of America which has led the United Kingdom down a decadent road of destruction in relation to our moral values.

Believing that they have taken us away from some of our foundational roots which were once grounded in solid Christian principles, you can be certain when anything goes wrong, and when we see an increase in violence, an uptake in drug use, or a slide down a shady grey road of more promiscuity, there will be some who will point a finger across the Atlantic to where the pilgrim fathers once set sail and blame it all on the Americans. It's easier that way.

Sure, we happen to have adopted an insatiable taste for your ham-burgers as well as a love for your westerns, and a penchant for the freedom expressed by a ride on a Harley Davidson along the open plains of an Arizonan desert; and for some, in more recent days, we have become decidedly taken by the messages that are being provided by American televangelists who have imported their best life now to our screens.

We have also willingly adopted the word 'awesome' and 'sure' and we interject the word 'like' into many of our sentences.

Like we know what we are talking about. Yes, the yanks have a lot to answer for. But, ya'll watch carefully now. British Values have not been tainted by America; they have been tainted by a non-judgemental multiculturalism which has been focused on changing attitudes and feelings towards others rather than valuing and protecting our own Christian heritage first. Leading and opening the door into our demise, has been the British establishment themselves, supported by some leaders in the Anglican Church. We have been considerably polite to everyone else but have never stood up or set boundaries for ourselves.

To my knowledge, America is still a few years behind us attempting to stem off the tide of destruction against the same formidable enemy affecting all areas of the American way of life.

An American reaches England

Over the years I have been very fortunate to meet people from America who are still standing up for the truth. In fact, it was almost 20 years ago when I found myself very alone in a church which was sliding down the road of complacency that friendship and help came from what we also once called a bright light on a shining hill. America. It was a strange experience at that time to find myself working in a traditional parish church yet finding the confirmation of the truth which was being revealed to me via correspondence and telephone calls, from America. God has mysterious ways of answering prayers, but he surely sent a friend one day from the best place there is.

Consequently, over the years it has been of tremendous relief to visit American sites such as News with Views and also make friends with other like-minded searchers of truth. Some of the greatest encouragers that I know have always come from America.

I possess a beautiful Ryrie Bible which unexpectedly arrived in the post one day some years ago from Kelleigh Nelson who writes for this site, and as a result of my writing have also made a few friends across the UK who have also become very disillusioned with the church and the state of our country.

Today, many British people will still find either their information, or their confirmation, revealed to them from the more honest and inquisitive minds of America. Many Americans still highly value their independence and their right to speak up and speak out, to a much higher degree.

Recently, I was also able to also meet up with a minister and his wife from Perry in Georgia, Wayne and Linda Edwards from Heritage Baptist Church.

Through mutual connections he was able to come and visit people here who basically no longer belong to main stream religion and find themselves holding small house churches, or else they are walking alone. The book of Revelation may refer to them as the remnant.

I cannot speak personally for him, but I do believe he was very sad to see just how far we have declined in this country, most especially when the UK used to produce some of the best Christian witnesses and inspirational speakers there was, such as C. H. Spurgeon, William Wilberforce, William Tyndale, C.S. Lewis, David Livingstone, and of course the Mayflower Pilgrims.

Today, for the best part, the Christian church has become very weak. Of what is remaining, we have the architecture, the stained glass windows and selective words from the bible, which can sound very beautiful, but they have lost the spirit of truth. Many ministers cannot see the truth, or else they possess no courage to speak the most difficult parts, which spoken without love or understanding sound harsh, and as a consequence have isolated true believers and damaged many lives with its lies.

Consider, since 2001, in the capital alone over 500 London churches of various denominations are now private homes. In the area where I live myself there are 3 small chapels which have now become recently converted, and some years ago I shopped at a large Sainsbury's supermarket which was once called St George's church. (St George was executed for refusing to make a sacrifice in honour of pagan Gods) There is a loss of respect for the Christian faith as the solid stability it once provided, crumbles.

London however, has over 423 new mosques and many stand on the site of former Christian churches. In a suburb of Birmingham, which is the second largest city in the UK, it is an Islamic minaret which now dominates the skyline calling people to prayer every day through loudspeakers.

Multiculturalism accused of being the actual threat to Islamic terrorists is really a friend to a growing religion in the UK.

But 'hey' let's still blame it all on America!

Saying it like it is will have you criticised for creating division.

"Houston – We have a problem"

A Lot of Hot Air!

British activists who see the America president, Donald Trump, as a threat to all things liberal and multi-cultural in the United Kingdom have decided to make their own personal statement in the skies when he visits this once great country in July this year.

It is reported that already over $14,000 has been raised to inflate a large 'Trump Baby' balloon which features an inflated oversized baby Trump wearing a diaper. They believe that this represents all of Britain looking down on him and laughing at his over-sized ego.

How wrong and how childish can people be? However does this represent a majority of people who are living in denial about the state of our nation?

Of those who know about the stunt, over 9,000 people have now signed a petition calling on London mayor, Sadiq Khan to allow the balloon to fly. The plea reads:

Donald Trump is a big, angry baby with a fragile ego.

He's also a racist demagogue who is a danger to women, immigrants and minorities and a mortal threat to world peace and the very future of life on earth. Moral outrage is water off a duck's back to Trump, but he really seems to hate it when people make fun of him.

You can see the petition here.

Wow!

It will be interesting to see the outcome on which way this baby flies!

Silent No More

Travelling home on the train after meeting with Wayne and Linda Edwards and my friends, I reflected on the years since God first spoke to me in his still silent voice when I was all alone in a world of chaos in a small parish church. He has consistently revealed things to me which have gone against all I was ever indoctrinated in to through believing lies and liberal propaganda.

The train journey took twice as long as expected. A person who was having a particular bad time had decided to take his life on the rail track that day. I started a conversation with a young man from the army who carried my case and shook my hand when he left, and I later spoke to an elderly English lady who was returning home to New York on the Queen Mary from Southampton. She jokingly told me she had originally gone to America to learn them to speak English. Yeah.

As the train commenced its journey, I eventually watched the patchwork green fields of England whiz past the train window once more and thought about all the people I'd met and heard about just in one weekend, I wondered how after God had helped me so much I could ever stay silent.

Despite hardship and suffering God gives us peace and a certain quiet joy when we adhere to the truth. You can always respect another's traditions but you can never let them displace you. Displacement is the key issue in the battle for our souls.

Wayne Edwards spoke on how the bible relates to the time period and the events taking place, in relation to where we are in history at this current time. I did not understand a lot of the interpretation of this but could see without a doubt just by looking out of the window the truth of all this.

It is now so evident to see just how far the UK has declined you wonder how people can still rejoice over a multi-cultural society.

Despite these days, and the relationship with the timelines of the bible, America and the UK should never stay silent. We should still always have hope and speak about it. Let's always talk about it.

Lives depend on it.

How sweet it is to learn the Savior's love when nobody else loves us! When friends flee, what a blessed thing it is to see that the Savior does not forsake us but still keeps us and holds us fast and clings to us and will not let us go!
–Charles Spurgeon

Tommy Robinson: British Government Threatening To Arrest Journalists For Reporting The Truth

They say that pride always comes before a fall, and if the last few weeks are anything to go by, the United Kingdom has well and truly fallen. How can this be?

One minute the British were waving their flags, bending their knee and tipping their hats at the marriage of the year, and the next minute we were facing some disgrace over the seizure of an independent reporter Tommy Robinson, who was swept up, arrested, sentenced and imprisoned within hours on May 25th, 2018.

It certainly messes with your emotions.

His crime; reporting outside Leeds Crown Court where 29 defendants were facing charges of alleged sex abuse and grooming of children and young women. He was accused of Breach of the Peace

He was later arrested under the Contempt of Court Act 1981, meaning that because he was live streaming his report outside the court, he could possibly influence proceedings. He had also already been warned previously and was on a suspended sentence. The Contempt of Court Act ensures defendants receive a fair trial.

His arrest sent shock waves around the world, whilst many people in the United Kingdom were still totally unaware, because of a complete ban on the reporting of the events. We were still feeding on the remnants of a royal wedding.

The love affair was fun whilst it lasted, but sadly the reality has now set in and there is a strange and almost threatening atmosphere amongst a certain number of the population as the realization as to exactly what has been physically witnessed in this arrest hits home. Some people are outraged, some are frightened, and many people are just in a state of disbelief because they cannot believe you can be treated in such a way over freedom of speech, most especially when you are reporting on such a hideous crime. They are also 'tired'.

Not far from where thousands of tourists and well-wishers lined the streets to celebrate a wedding, and where the homeless were also swept up and hid away, we now see demonstrators, who some like to call thugs or far-right activists expressing their frustration and their disbelief, shouting shame on the establishment. They chant 'Free Tommy Robinson'.

However, protests had been made earlier in May outside Leeds Crown Court by a number of protestors representing different ethnic groups.

A Right British Geezer

Love him or hate him, Tommy Robinson, whose real name is Stephen Yaxley-Lennon is of course a pretty fearless man, although he does often say he is very fearful for the future of his children. He is down to earth, rough around the edges, street-wise, and has a very chequered past. He has been arrested and cautioned many times, and has also served a jail sentence. He also knew he was breaking the conditions of his suspended sentence. He primarily reports on the dangers of radical Islam and mass immigration in the UK, and for this reason there is often great offence taken against him for his criticisms. People believe he is promoting 'Hate Crime' [Link]

Some of his followers are indeed reminiscent of the type of in your face menacing thugs you would see at a football brawl and avoid, but they are also the type of working class person who say it as it is, and who would equally drop everything they are doing to help an old lady across the road. They can be fiercely patriotic.

Criticizers of Robinson, often bring up the rough element of his demonstrations, distracting from the violent crimes that he is attempting to expose. Often, there is little discussion; he points out his facts, and the accuser, usually the interviewer, using reverse psychology, calls him a racist. It's as simple as that.

There are certain things which I would not agree with him about, but in comparison to some of the politicians and media reporters who touch on the subject of mass immigration or radical Islam he is representing more fully what the general population secretly believe. There is a serious problem. Why can't we talk about it?

What is troubling about this event is that many people are treated in a similar fashion on a daily basis merely for expressing their thoughts on certain subjects which don't fit the new British values which have been slowly and methodically introduced. People are cautioned within their workplace, they lose their jobs, and they put themselves at risk merely for not going along with a rose coloured consensus view which is being forced upon them. Robinson was prepared to just continue on regardless because he wanted to expose a gang rape culture which is hitting the cities of the UK. Was he right to do this, or wrong?

In regards to the worst ever child grooming scandal in a town called Telford, I have visited this town.

It is semi-rural and not a typical inner city town. It is surrounded by beautiful countryside and very near to the border of Wales. It is also directly linked by motorway to one of the major cities in the West Midlands, Birmingham. It is difficult to believe that such crime existed in this area but the facts are quite shocking about the number of abused girls, alleged to be about 1000 since the 1980's.

Therefore, why do people hate Tommy Robinson so much when he is risking his life to expose what is happening?

Here is a talk by him from the Oxford Union, a prestigious and world known debating society from the city of Oxford, England, where he explains how two worlds collide in Luton, Tommy's home town. It is a respectful setting to listen to his side of a story. It was filmed in 2015 and it gives the underpinning reasons why he is so outspoken and driven. [YouTube Video]

His parting words in the video in relation to being arrested before for freedom of speech is 'If they can do it to me, they can do it to you'

Hello Darkness My Old Friend

Whilst people debate whether Tommy was rightfully or wrongfully arrested outside Leeds Crown Court, the subject of silencing people in such extreme ways is really what lies at the heart of the whole matter.

Not being able to speak up, and being labelled hateful for exposing the truth is like slowly suffocating. You go beyond being merely tactful or respectful in your speech and you go completely quiet and resentful within your spirit. You isolate yourself and you shut the world out, alternatively you compromise and make friends with the enemy of your spirit. You allow it the freedom to say what it wishes. Sometimes you explode aggressively, but eventually you die from lack of oxygen and life as you feed your aggressor. It is a cancer and it's spreading.

The marriage of England and America as depicted in the most recent royal wedding, held the last tinges of hope, a little light relief and a reminiscence of what love might really be. Sadly, nothing is as it seems; we have become the most silenced of bed partners. Will America take its warnings from what they have witnessed here?

Has Britain's Culture Of Death Cost Baby Alfie His Life?, Part 2

how it has lost, and is losing its values and decency, and how we are daily losing our free speech.)

Part 2, Of Royal Birth Descended

It has always been fairly easy in some sense to view the laws of 'cause and effect' in action. In relation to the human body, if it is subjected to a toxic substance, either physically or spiritually, it is more than evident that it will also result in disease, unrest, and eventually death.

However, all of us are born to possess 'defects', in some shape or form; it is part of the human condition, and we can also be subject to the many toxins of our environment. Overcoming them and doing the right thing appears to be a calling that some people will make, whilst others will not.

In terms of people born with a severe physical disability, one of the most insightful and inspirational people I have come across is a well known Christian international speaker.
(views may not be the same as the writers)

Born with no arms and no legs, he was once tempted to take his own life when he was a child. He now travels the world encouraging and inspiring others to overcome their own personal disabilities; in every way. He gives a message of hope. After the initial shock of witnessing this man, in his very vulnerable state, you realize his spirit has become much more the person he is, than the obvious fact of his disabilities. He is an over-comer and an encourager. He is free.

After a short time of listening to him, his message is much more important. You can listen to him here.

It is my opinion that if there is a passage from the bible which sums him up, and epitomises who he is, it could possibly be from John 9:2, which surmises that some defects are for the purpose of Gods glory being revealed through them. Who are we to judge?

However, not all people see the potential that our very defected lives can offer. Could it be that there are some people who view others as an undesirable, a mere resource or a burden in society? Is there a race of people who see themselves as superior?

Eugenics, 'the selection of desired human characteristics in order to improve future generations' has both positive and negative reviews, and whilst we mainly attribute negative eugenics to the atrocities/experiments carried out in Nazi Germany, there is a history before the holocaust, which stems from England and also the United States, from which, it is reported, Hitler, and Mengele also drew their inspiration from.

Briefly, British born, Francis Galton, related to Charles Darwin, and inspired by Darwin's book, 'Origin of Species' believed breeding humans with superior mental traits was essential to society. He coined the phrase 'eugenics' and became knighted in 1909 to become 'Sir' Francis Galton for his research and scientific contributions, and it is believed he is responsible for launching the eugenics movement in the UK and also the USA. [Link]

British Labour MP Archibald Church, possibly inspired by selective breeding, had proposed the compulsory sterilisation, like Germany, of certain 'mental patients' in Parliament in 1931, and although not passed, many sterilisations were forcibly carried out in England.

However, previously in 1907, men, women and children in America thought to be insane, or idiotic, epileptic or even promiscuous were forcibly sterilised by authorities who saw them as unfit to reproduce.

Other countries in the 20's and 30's had also passed similar laws, including the Scandinavian countries of Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Finland. Such was the trend in eugenics.

Forced sterilization ended in America in 1974

In researching the history of eugenics you will find a history of sterilisation of undesirable people that our countries would rather forget or overlook.

In Britain, there have been recent cases of forced sterilisation which has brought up the debate on whether it is impinging on a woman's human rights to be forcibly sterilized whether she has the mental capacity to understand the consequences of her actions or not? [Link]

It also seems somehow ironic that Francis Galton, who was born in Birmingham, England and studied for two years at Birmingham General Hospital, is connected to Birmingham Children's Hospital, who were accused of removing 1500 hearts from patients without permission from relatives just twenty years ago.

Tomorrow's Children

It appears that whilst we are being encouraged to believe that only positive eugenics are taking place today, by way of research to improve genetic conditions or illnesses, that there is a spirit of superiority which still exists which believes that some human beings are there to be tested upon, saved or discarded in an experimental fashion for another more underlying motive.

Further, is euthanasia, disguised as a type of dignity in dying, abortion, promiscuity, now being promoted in order to depopulate society in order for those who consider themselves the fitter more elite person to survive? No longer are people forcibly euthanized or sterilised, mankind does this to itself under the guise of 'freedom to choose' whilst it is really under the spirit of what we call negative eugenics, a culture of death and under the same spirit which we attribute to the evil of Hitler's death camps!

Serious thought should be given to the question "are we now living in one big death camp, giving permission, and thanking our captors for killing and experimenting on us?" or "Are we free, kind and compassionate people?"

Has the positive and sincere quest for improving human life through genuine medical research and enquiry descended?

The outright denial of further medical help and care offered to the family of Alfie Evans, following on from Charlie Gard, and the arrest of Ashya King's parents for removing their child from hospital, sadly gives us this impression. [Link], [Link]

Hiding behind a plethora of kind words the world was witnessing some very cruel actions.

Sadly, whilst supporters of Alfie Evans family were demonstrating and voicing their concerns, and were being condemned for bringing his plight to public light, celebrations were taking place for pro-choice advocates in London after the UK's first PSPO order (Public Space Protection Order) was passed which effectively bans pro-life advocates from being within 100 metres of a West London abortion clinic. To break that law you can face a fine of up to £1000. One can only imagine how PSPO orders will now be used against future pro-lifers or against any other demonstrations or objections raised on ethical issues.

It should be remembered that those who spoke out against

Hitler's regime also faced threats or imprisonment and some were even executed. PSP0 orders may not execute people who break its law but most certainly it seems to be persecuting those who defend life. [Link]

Almost 77 years ago, the Bishop of Munster, Clemens August Graf von Galen spoke out against the Nazi euthanasia programme. He is known as The Lion of Munster, and you can read about him here in an excellent article.

He is quoted as saying:

"If you establish and apply the principle that you can 'kill' unproductive human beings, then woe betide us all when we become old and frail!. . . Do you, do I have the right to live only as long as we are productive?. . . Nobody would be safe anymore. Who could trust his physician? It is inconceivable what depraved conduct, what suspicion could enter family life if this terrible doctrine is tolerated, adopted, carried out."

I love Von Galen's motto. Nec Laudibus, Nec Timore – Unconcerned about praise, or fear.

People who are pro-life should be encouraged by Von Galen's stand. Nobility is a spirit, in the same vein as 'Grace'. The blood which runs through your veins could be from the most royal of all births. Only God knows....

Of Royal Birth, Descended, Part 1

Prince William and Katherine Middleton announced the name of their third child quite recently. It is Louis Arthur Charles, and he will be known as His Royal Highness, Prince Louis of Cambridge.

I noted that the actual birth of Prince Louis had been somewhat low-key, in comparison to previous royal births.

It was a whole week before I knew he had been born. I believe the reason for this was that public world attention was being given to the plight of two year old Alfie Evans, who died under controversial circumstances in Alder Hey Hospital, Liverpool very recently.

The story of Alfie Evans can be viewed here.

Public celebrations for the royal birth also seemed very minimal, and whilst we have delighted in viewing the beautiful photographs of the royal baby meeting his siblings, you could not help or fail to compare the images of privilege and happiness, against the many images of little Alfie, who at the same time, in his own vulnerability, appeared to many people to be in the hands of another authority who did not have his, or his parents, best interests at heart.

The controversy around a court decision to switch of vital life support and refuse his parents permission to seek further alternative help which was being offered to them raised a great amount of frustration for many British citizens who questioned the reason for this. What impact would that decision have on all vulnerable patients, who could possibly have a chance of life?

Some people were very vocal about the treatment of Alfie Evans and his parents, and also against Alder Hey Hospital. There were accusations directed at the demonstrators being insulting to staff and visitors outside of the hospital. Staff staff spoke of genuine fear!

But not everyone was critical about the decisions being made about Alder Hey Hospital and Alfie Evans.

The Archbishop of Liverpool, Malcolm McMahon, was very 'supportive' of the decisions made by Alder Hey Hospital, but emphasized they were praying for Alfie's parents. [Link]

The Prime Minister, Theresa May, showed sympathy towards the case but respected the 'difficult' decisions made by clinicians, and it is reported believes that clinicians should decide on a child's life, and not parents. [Link]

Unfortunately, it appears The Church of England, which belongs to The State of England, and answers to the government have said very little. Her Majesty the Queen is the supreme governor of The Church of England.

Therefore, some people have stayed silently watching. Sympathetic, but silent.

Merseyside Police, who are the police force for the Liverpool area had also issued a statement in relation to criticism against Alder Hey Hospital.

Chief Inspector Chris Gibson said:

"Merseyside Police has been made aware of a number of social media posts which have been made with reference to Alder Hey Hospital and the ongoing situation involving Alfie Evans.

"I would like to make people aware that these posts are being monitored and remind social media users that any offences including malicious communications and threatening behaviour will be investigated and where necessary will be acted upon."

Somewhere in that silence, where some people have the authority to speak up and make their voices known, and some people are being silenced; and amidst the celebration of new life and a sentence of death for a baby, hangs the truth, staring back at you.

What exactly is going on when parents and children are held in hospitals against their will, and all offers of alternative medical help are rejected? That is the question?

What's it All About?

The divide between people who used the words of compassion and dignity to excuse the decision made upon Alfie's life, against those who saw the spirit of arrogance and dictatorship staring right back at them and laying down its law, was tangible. It could not have been more evident. The aftermath of that decision is still hanging in the air. It has left a stale taste and many un-answered questions for those who rely on a National Health Service, and also for some of those who work in the National Health Service.

An establishment which once preserved and fought for human life at all costs, seems to have become infiltrated with a culture of death and decision making which goes against reason. Whilst the public greatly appreciate our medical services, there are also decisions being made which the public and many members of the medical profession are also at odds against. They support the Hippocratic tradition.

Alder Hay Hospital in particular, has already received many bad reviews and has a very dark history which involved organ retention and organ harvesting from children's bodies without permission from parents. During the period from 1988 – 1995 more than 2,000 pots containing body parts from 850 infants were uncovered.

In 1999, the public had been unaware that Alder Hey and other hospitals were retaining patient's organs without their consent.

The Alder Hey report (known as Redfern Report) was published in 2001.

Dutch pathologist Dick van Velzen had ordered the illegal stripping of every organ during a post mortem from every child during his time at the hospital.

The report also revealed that Birmingham Children's Hospital and Alder Hey Hospital gave thymus glands removed from live children during heart surgery to a pharmaceutical company for research in return for donations.

You can read the report here.

This is the reason why people should not stay silent or be silenced on such important ethical issues in healthcare.

[Link]

When Alfie's life support was removed on the 23rd April, at the final instruction of the High Court, and he breathed on his own, showing signs of recognition and normality, not only did a population cheer for this little human life, but thousands of medical staff did too.

Many staff who wanted to sustain Alfie's life and give him every conceivable chance was also being over-ruled by senior medical staff and a court system, who it is reported, had refused to consider any appeal by the parents.

It appears they also refused to listen to citizens who pay for the National Health Service, and they also refused to listen to an appeal from Pope Francis in Rome who had granted the child Italian citizenship to be treated in Italy, with absolutely no cost to Britain. On the 23rd April, the day Alder Hay Hospital switched off his life support machine, a military air ambulance fully equipped to take Alfie to Bambino Gesù Hospital was already waiting.

The anguish, knowing about that offer of hope for some chance of life, which must have been experienced by his parents, was felt by thousands.

Alfie died on the 28th April.

Today, Monday 14th May it is his funeral.

We honor his short life. Thank you Alfie for showing us your trust and your vulnerability in this harsh world and from your silent and peaceful world at least alerting us once more to our responsibility in protecting and valuing human life.

“If you want peace, work for justice. If you want justice, defend life. If you want life, embrace the truth the truth revealed by God.”

British Double Standard: One For The Royals Another For The People

When I was a child, I had my very own bodyguard. His name was Robert Barker, and he was the boy next door.

If anyone at school threatened me, then the name of Robert Barker would be sure to send just a few shock-waves through the mind of any kid who thought they could beat me up or threaten me. He was a very useful neighbour to know.

At home, I would secretly design wedding dresses; this was my knight in shining armour. He was tall, dark, and had muscle.

One evening, whilst sitting safely on the garden swing in my own back garden, I noticed Robert was looking out of his bedroom window. He vanished, and then returned with his air rifle and shot a bird that was innocently sitting on a branch right above me. As it landed at my feet, with its wings splayed, I noticed there was blood leaking from its motionless chest. He had already filled my mother's garden ornaments with lead pellets and destroyed them, now he had taken the life of this innocent little bird. There and then, as I looked up and saw Robert Barker grinning from ear to ear with pride, it was decided; this marriage had ended, and it was the end of my very fine romance.

Boys with air rifles were just a little bit too risqué, I would now rely on my own awareness, a bit of charm, and a small black plastic spud gun, which could possibly look real to the unsuspecting.

But as the years have passed in England, and where our total dependence on an overworked and depleted police force, and a considerable rise in violent crime now dominates society, personal protection seems to only be afforded to those of a special status. Even in your own back garden, there is an extreme vulnerability in every aspect of life for the ordinary man and woman.

Peace at What Price!

As London is now considered a city to be more violent than New York, with the investigation of 55 murders taking place in this year alone, the recent story of a 78 year old South London homeowner, Richard Osborn-Brooks, who recently defended himself and his wife with a 'screw-driver' in his own home, and was later arrested for murder, has brought to light not only what constitutes 'reasonable defence' for an un-armed individual, but has highlighted our own personal ethos, and what weapon, what action, and what tactic we may be allowed to use if faced with a similar situation to Mr Osborn-Brooks.

Following the Bataclan massacre in Paris, 2015, when Islamic terrorists shot and killed 90 concertgoers, staff at my place of work were seriously planning their escape routes should a similar incident ever occur in the relatively quiet, semi-rural, and un-noticeable building that we work in.

Was this an indication of an overly-reactive knee-jerk mentality to an isolated event, or a realistic view of just some of the dangers we now face in Europe?

Our cities, towns and some of the surrounding suburbs have now become places where your only protection may be to avoid them at all costs. If you have to travel through some area's you lock your doors, and you most certainly do not partake in any type of confrontation with another driver or get out of your car. At a moments notice, the polarization of yourself as an individual and the area that you find yourself in may become painfully clear. The streets now belong to a more aggressive and streetwise individual, who, in the absence of a police presence, has claimed ownership. Whereas, these areas were once in a minority; like a virus, petty and violent crime is spreading and it is creeping up upon many areas across the country which were once considered relatively safe.

In many instances, the law is also favouring the side of the aggressor and not the victim. This is creating an overall tension, a state of suspicion, and an increased fear across the country. The initial arrest of Mr Osborn-Brooks, although he has now been released, raised an overall national outcry. This is because there is now a very long history of unfavourable outcomes which has seen perpetrators of crime walk free based on their human rights.

As we live in a country where individual protection has been largely handed over to the state, people are now crying out for more law enforcement and a more visible presence of police on our streets. However, will this usher in a police state, where we might see armed servicemen and police patrolling the streets as we once witnessed in Northern Ireland (1969-1998) Is this now our very own era of 'troubles'? A Return to the Garden

Feeling safe, by whatever means, within your own home and garden, should be an individual's right, regardless of your position or status in life.

Today in 2018, because of the increase in crime in the UK, I would once more dearly love to have my very own Robert Barker to keep a watchful eye over me. Despite his child-like enthusiasm to impress the girl next door by shooting a bird, in our school days he still had a heart for protecting the weaker person from the bully.

In the face of the continuous growing evil which we confront today, I have slowly re-kindled my love affair towards those who know how to physically protect themselves. I understand more clearly the battle we face in an imperfect world.

The reality is that evil holds no fear in killing someone. Your charm or vulnerability, and even an escape plan, cannot deter an assailant who wishes to destroy you. Mr Osborn-Brooks only had a screw-driver to protect himself and his disabled wife. Unfortunately, it fatally wounded his assailant, but what would have happened if he had not attempted to protect his family?

How fortunate are those who are able to be physically protected?

In 2013, whilst walking in his own back garden in the grounds of Buckingham Palace, Prince Andrew was not so grateful. When armed policeman designated to protect the royal family mistook him for an intruder and he was ordered to identify himself, he reacted angrily by saying "Don't you know who I am". It is reported he was 'incredibly' angry as he didn't like guns being pointed at him. Later, it was reported that the police had to profusely apologise to him. He offered this conciliatory statement:

'The police have a difficult job to do balancing security for the royal family and deterring intruders, and sometimes they get it wrong.'

But hinting at his anger over the confrontation, he added: 'I am grateful for their apology and look forward to a safe walk in the garden in the future.'

The garden fences are down, we have no security patrolling our grounds, wolves and foxes trample over the flower beds as they weave their way through urban streets in the dead of night looking for any left over pickings and an easy pocket to pick or pounce upon. In the distance, there is the sound of running.

I remember life as a child and the safety of the garden. Come back Robert Barker, you can bring your air rifle, some real muscle, a catapult and your cheesy grin; all is forgiven.

School Shootings And Cover-Up In Britain

For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. –Ephesians 6:12

Considering I live in a country where the majority of people have never owned a gun or even seen a real one; there's an awful lot of talk about gun control going on over here.

Sparked once more by the most recent mass shootings in Las Vegas and Florida, our mainstream news seems to be vehemently attacking the American people, and in particular, its president, Donald Trump, for protecting second amendment rights on a monumental scale.

Leading the way, British journalist Piers Morgan is one of the most formidable and aggressive forces amongst us, in his attack on gun ownership and its laws in America. Highlighting the obvious random murders which are carried out by gunfire upon innocent adults and children, he appears to be championing a cause which many British people support.

Maybe, it is our obvious differences in how we have been exposed to firearms that creates the chasm, and now affords such support; but are countries which now live under very strict gun ownership controls any safer than in America, and do will live under an illusion of feeling protected based on our past history as being a country with one of the lowest rates of gun homicide based on tight gun control?

I have discovered, one of the most stringent gun control laws enforced in the UK came about in the late 1990's when a ban was made on all handguns (with the exception of those chambered for .22 rim fire cartridges) by John Major under the conservative government and later by Tony Blair under the labour government who went on to ban the .22 handguns. [Read]

This came about after 16 children aged six and under together with a teacher was shot and killed in a primary school in Dunblane, Scotland in 1996. [Read]

Dunblane, which is a small quiet village, was visited by local resident, Thomas Hamilton, a legal gun owner, early one morning just as school had started. He proceeded to walk through the school, opening fire and randomly shoot children.

Today, the public are unable to read the full investigation into Dunblane, called the Cullen Inquiry, because of a closure order preventing publication for 100 years. However, some of the documents were released in 2005 revealing that Hamilton had previously been under investigation by Child Protection for many charges which included assault and obstructing police. It is reported that no action was taken.

Dunblane seems to hold a 'secret', and an untold story. It is very evident the village is united and not quite at peace about the outcome with the inquiry. I don't blame them. The question on why no action was taken against Hamilton has raised some accusations of there being a cover-up.

In Dunblane Cathedral is a beautiful sculpture to the children who died. On one side of the sculpture it reads

"But still I dream that somewhere there must be the spirit of a child that waits for me”

The quotation to me seems to sum up a loss of innocence on our own part, besides being dedicated to the families and children of the Dunblane Massacre. [Read]

Knife Crime in the UK

The UK is no stranger to random attacks upon children in schools.

In 2001, I happened to work for a short time for an organization called Spurgeon’s Child Care. In a new initiative to recruit volunteers to visit children who were in care, and to launch the project, I was delegated to find a suitable celebrity to speak at the launch. It was a difficult task. Eventually, I wrote to a young lady by the name of Lisa Potts, who had been awarded the George Medal for her bravery. In 1996, she had been working at an infant school as a nursery nurse and a man entered the playground and proceeded to attack them with a machete. In attempting to protect the children, one of Lisa’s arms was almost completely severed, and she suffered severe cuts to her head, back and other arm. Several children were also very badly injured.

The assailant, Horrett Campbell, who was arrested the day after the attack claimed that he heard voices, and that he was told the children ‘represented the devil’. It is also reported that he idolized the killer Thomas Hamilton, the murderer of the Dunblane incident.

It is reported he showed no remorse and saw what he had done as a good thing. [Read]

Currently the number of people owning licensed firearms in the UK is 2 million together with 1.3 million legal shotguns in England and Wales. This does not account for the number of illegal owners. Every household most certainly possess knives, although a machete cannot be accounted for. There is a significant rise in both gun and knife crime in the UK, and whilst some British citizens live under a false sense of feeling protected, some are very aware of our vulnerability in a world of increased violence which now incorporates terrorism. We are also aware of no-go areas, honour killings, child abuse on a grand scale, an increase in rape, human trafficking and increased drug and alcohol addiction within the population. In respect of mental health problems, health agencies report that patients with mental health problems are more of a danger to themselves than other people. [Read]

Time to Change, an organization which aims to change attitudes towards mental health states:

“The majority of violent crimes and homicides are committed by people who do not have mental health problems” [Read]

My own thoughts are that violent crimes and homicides are not committed by anyone who is in a ‘balanced’ state of mind.

We should all strive for a balanced mind. This is under threat.

On a daily basis our exposure to crime and fear, with fear being the operative word is growing; and yet to speak out about fear of terrorism, or our caution around some people who appear to be very unbalanced, is becoming the worst crime of all.

Hate Speech

Hate speech seems to account for anything which might offend or hurt someone else’s feelings or views. It can lose you your job, imprison you, and isolate you. It is extremely one-sided.

Those who feel you are being hateful by pointing out obvious facts can be very aggressive.

Many tactics used by hardened news reporters, politicians, some activists (and journalist’s) can bully you down into submission by over-talking you, accusing you, contradicting you and confusing you.

We live in a Dunblane scenario of hidden truth and suppressed facts. Innocence becomes lost. We die internally, our voices not heard; resentment and injustice grows, our thoughts torment us.

Thoughts can become audible; good becomes bad, and bad becomes good. Confusion is life threatening because it can change your identity.

In a recent interview with British journalist Cathy Newman and her guest, Canadian professor Jordon Peterson on the gender pay gap, the questioning became an interrogation using all of the above tactics. When Peterson was accused of offending other people he admitted that this is what we must risk and accept from each other in order for healthy conversation and he had sat for a long time being offended and made very uncomfortable by Newman's questioning. He displayed a vast amount of grace and wisdom during the interview. He did however know his enemy. He knew that which was outside him and he knew that which was inside himself.

You can watch the interview here.

"The art of war teaches us to rely not on the likelihood of the enemy's not coming, but on our own readiness to receive him; not on the chance of his not attacking, but rather on the fact that we have made our position unassailable." –Sun Tzu (The Art of War)

Will The British Government Control Sexual Values Of Its Citizens?

Pompeii Meets Piccadilly?

Apparently, over 100 million people pass through Piccadilly Circus, in London's west end each year. Known for its large illuminated advertising space called 'Piccadilly Lights', which has recently been refurbished, and for its many theatre's, shops and restaurants; it is one of those iconic landmarks, a tourist attraction and meeting place.

British people will often refer to any crowded place as being 'just like Piccadilly Circus'. It is one of those colloquial sayings we have, which even if you haven't been there, will often be recognised for the state you are referring to. It is loud, busy and chaotic. When you visit Piccadilly Circus you can keep going round in circles. It is where many roads meet.

It has featured in such films as Whatever a Man Soweth (1917) The 39 Steps, (1935) Don't Look Now (1973) and V for Vendetta (2005)

In 2002, it is reported that Yoko Ono, widow of the late John Lennon, paid for a banner to be displayed for 3 months in Piccadilly Circus to display the words from his song Imagine; "Imagine all the people living life in peace" to promote world peace in the wake of September 11th.

In theory, it is one of those places which will demand your attention with its messages. You can't get advertising much bigger or bolder in the UK than in Piccadilly Circus. You just need the right amount of money.

However, this week a much quieter event should have been taking place there. Passers by and tourists may have been totally unaware of its presence as their attention would be averted by the bright lights of advertising. The premier showing of a documentary called 'Voices of the Silenced' was scheduled to be taking place to a private audience at the Vue Cinema.

The film had advertised on its website that it would be highlighting the goals of sexual politics and the silencing of views which are in opposition to the pansexual cultures of the pre-Christian Graeco-Roman world.

It also asked an important question:

Will the church recognize the dangers of capitulation to state control of sexual values and a return to the ancient cultures that its Jewish roots taught it to reject?

The organization, Core Issues Trust who support people who wish to move away from same-sex attraction, had filmed their documentary across seven countries, speaking with various professionals on the subject, and it contained interviews with people who had voluntarily sought counseling.

However, it is reported that after details were obtained by Pink News, an LGBT news publisher, 600 people petitioned for the screening to be cancelled; which indeed, at the last minute, it was.

In the many interviews which I have listened to which feature Mike Davidson, who is the director of Core Issues he continually re-iterates that they never promote 'gay-cure' or 'conversion'. They are terms which are continually used by opponents who wish to discredit the help that they offer.

Baroness Barker from the House of Lords made the following statement for Pink News:

“People who preach gay conversion therapy are zealots who are prepared to cause great harm to LGBT people in order to perpetuate their warped view of the world. Happy, healthy societies should send them packing.”

If we are in any doubt that we are living in a society that is being dictated to on its sexual values, showing no consideration to another point of view, then the boycotting of a film called The Voices of the Silenced has pretty much summed up the frustration and the hypocrisy that many people are witnessing and feel unable to express.

What happened to free speech and what an aptly named film.

Up Pompeii

Apparently, over 3 million people also visit the ancient ruins of Pompeii in Southern Italy each year. Eager to view the city which was first discovered in the 16th century, ongoing excavations have revealed a preserved city that sheds light on how people lived in the ancient world.

When I visited it was a quiet, peaceful and sunny day with very few tourists.

When you are there you are always aware of the presence of the volcano, Mt Vesuvius which dominates the skyline and which buried Pompeii under volcanic ash when it erupted in A.D 79, on an equally sunny morning.

An eyewitness during the time of the eruption who lived across the Bay of Naples recorded “Darkness fell, not the darkness of a moonless or cloudy night, but as if the lamp had been put out in a dark room”. (Pliny)

The excavated city reveals a well designed and affluent city where wealthy Romans would have resided or visited. There are many temples all dedicated to different gods, Apollo, Jupiter, Isis, Fortuna Augusta, Vespasian. There are political messages etched on the walls of the houses, together with rude critical messages aimed at specific citizens (a bit like face book or twitter)!

The many fresco's and artwork discovered depict a lifestyle that was indeed pansexual. The images can be quite shocking. Some are pornographic. Eroticism was valued and magic was routinely practised. It is very clear without a doubt that it was a life that was not hidden. Prostitution was legal. Slavery was rife. In fact, Pompeii seems to be known for its unlimited sexual licence. Anything goes.

Contrary to people thinking that Pompeii is the revelation of a bygone culture that has died it is evident that all of those practices are being dictated and resurrected into this present age.

Bringing on the Gladiators

Somewhere, behind the scene's you sense there is a spirit taking great pleasure in watching people fight it out, pitching each other, against each other. Thumbs up for letting them live, thumbs down for silencing them for good.

Is there anything noble left fighting for? Is it true...?

"What we do in life... echoes in eternity."

Attempting to warn people of the dangers of an open and promiscuous society in a country which wants to promote the teaching of sexual practices, including pan-sexuality, as a compulsory topic to children from a very young age; people who do attempt to bring up any objection are subjected to being accused of being bigots or terrorists, or they are accused of practising a 'certain type of religion'.

The certain type of religion they are referring to is actually one that wants to hold on to decency and value for all people, and it comes from many different concerned people. It is attempting to protect children from unwanted indoctrination.

On the whole, many churches in the UK are not speaking up very much about this, but rather are embracing a politically correct stance. It is becoming a weak church with no respect.

Christianity in some parts of Europe is also going underground, in readiness for a persecution like that seen in Roman times where non adherence or worship to a governments values resulted in death.

Doing it for the Children

In the opening of the new Piccadilly Lights you will see many subliminal messages in the following YouTube Video clip.

One should ask what was learnt from the history of Pompeii and the eruption of Mount Vesuvius that plunged that city into darkness.

Did light shine in their darkness or did their darkness perceive it not?

Are you free or a slave of the Roman Empire?

If you stand very still in the middle of Picadilly Circus you may ask yourself this question and think about the Voices of the Silenced.

Who Took The Christ Out Of Christmas?

*Silent Night, Holy Night
All is Calm, All is Bright.*

Last weekend I was snowed in, and it was wonderful. Everywhere looked clean and pristine outside. The sky was clear blue, the air was fresh, and there was a silence and warmth that seemed to permeate the whole atmosphere.

As the central heating got notched up a couple more degrees and the fire belted out a warm orange glow, I decided to go all Christmassy and put up a tree, decorate it, and string some lights around it.

After the finishing touch of a star on top of the tree, I stood back, observing my handiwork, and wondered about the strange tradition we have of putting a tree inside the house and hanging ornaments from it. I had some pretty bizarre decorations!

Nonetheless, the twinkling lights against the backdrop of snow outside the window created a cosy atmosphere. All was well.

The epic 1959 version of the movie Ben Hur, would be showing later in the afternoon on TV; there would also be tea and toasted crumpets. What more could you ask for?

I looked out the window and saw my neighbour pulling his daughter on a sleigh up the hill. You could hear each one of his steps crunching in the snow, as she sat back and safely relaxed. They were the only people outside. No traffic, no pollution; just small figures against a plain white silent canvas.

Very soon, I would probably see them whiz down the hill past my house together.

But my day of bliss was about to be infiltrated. The world will always find you, even if you don't go out your own front door.

Sometimes, it will paint up lies and seduce you by using the same twinkling lights and some good old fashioned sentiment of how things should be, to keep you thinking that all is really well in our world despite the obvious slush. You have to be observant.

In the preceding 5 minutes whilst waiting for my movie to start I was treated to some Christmas adverts of the distorted kind.

A famous frozen food company advertising their oven chips, decided to tell me in a very gentle fashion what family really was. It could be one mummy and daddy, two daddies, a long distance father, a single mother, or a sister from another mister who comes around for tea. It then concluded with the statement 'We are all Family'. Hmm, I thought, an oven chip was teaching me something. That is certainly food for thought.

Next, a very large supermarket chain also decided a politically correct interpretation of Christmas was needed. With the strap line of 'Everyone's Welcome' the images depicted your typical Christmas gathering. There was the Sikh family, the introduction of the Muslim family, which has created a certain amount of controversy here, and then the white family; who couldn't quite get their oversized turkey in or out of the oven.

Well at least they hadn't been too obvious by removing the Christ out of Christmas by calling it Xmas. Yet, it was evident that the depiction of a Christian family was not welcome in its inclusive advert.

However, next came an in-depth and very scientific advert with diagrams for women's sanitary protection, and thank goodness I was all alone. Where do you look, and how quickly can you turn the television off in front of visitors when you are exposed to that which should really remain private.

And finally, came the infamous John Lewis department store advertisement, which we eagerly await each year for its innovative and very creative story lines, which have included 'Man on the Moon', Buster the Boxer, and this year, 'Moz the Monster', which features an oversized endearing monster that sleeps under the bed in a young boys room and comes out at night to play and care for the child.

Ironically, it had pretty much summed up the elephant in the room idiom, which no-one wanted to address in its adverts.

The commercialism of Christmas was being used to entice everyone into thinking we are one big happy family, without the need of a holy family. Women can bleed, but never the Christ.

Moz the Monster had also reminded me of the very popular children's film, Monsters Inc; in which monsters steal energy from children. The portal is the bedroom door where the monster enters the child's room and takes energy from the child's screams of terror. The monsters of course are very loveable, and you grow to like them. One of the most popular characters is called Mike Wazowski, and is a green, one eyed monster! If the devil is in the details, you really have to watch this film.

Suddenly, the fictional story of Judah Beh-Hur, who fights to restore honour to the family name, after being wrongly accused of treason by his adopted brother, appeared to be arriving at a very good time of the day. Some restoration to principles that were truly noble was definitely needed.

Follow that Star

As the evening came, and it grew dark outside, I switched off the fairy lights and looked out again. The stars were shining. A few cars had managed to make it out and were moving very slowly outside. The day had made me be still and slightly reflective in a positive way.

I thought of the scenes in Ben Hur, in which he searches for his mother and his sister, who he once thought were dead, and finds them in a leper colony; the scene where he is betrayed and finds himself being very cruelly treated, and the scene where he is given water by a stranger. There is a moment where Christ is on a hillside surrounded by those who wish to listen, and you see Ben-Hur on the peripheral of the crowds walking past them in the distance, going in a different direction. But the best part of the film in my mind is not the infamous chariot race of the movie, but the scene when the blood of the crucified Jesus runs into the rainwater and heals the relatives of Judah Ben Hur from their leprosy, after they had gone to hear his message. You know those things can and do happen.

The reality of Christmas is it can be an extremely reflective and emotional time for many people, because so many families are really very broken. They are trying to pretend everything is alright, just for one day. Many people who sit down to eat together are really ready to kill each other. When the day is over many children will wonder about the emptiness they still have inside, despite the numerous presents they have received. They will wonder where their sense of wonderment has gone, now that the expectation of the day has passed. It is the most honest observation they will make. The expectation of something that was not delivered

Yet, hope is not lost for those who focus on the real meaning of why Jesus came to earth, how he was born, how he lived, and why he was killed, and more importantly how you can be changed if you search for him. You can find your real father and brother, and realize what family really is. You can keep that warm glow, and a sense of peace, all year round. Christmas is a good time to reflect on that.

Christianity is of course being pushed underground on purpose. It seems to have been going on a very long time. The advertisers are focused on making money and also creating division when people point out the obvious about their adverts. Like champions for humanity they then come to the rescue accusing people of racism. People need to be aware of this.

They will not win. No contest. On a silent holy night, calm and bright, Jesus Christ was born, the Saviour. We remember his birth.

Happy Christmas Everyone

The Crucifixion Of Truth In The United Kingdom

The War Of Attrition

Almost everyone knows what it is like to live with a family member, a friend, or a work colleague, who through an outright or subtle form of manipulation, can eventually wear you down into submission.

Sometimes, we call it a 'battle of wills'; as we attempt to fight off a wilful or controlling spirit that manifests itself through many relationships that we are involved in. You can be urged to believe its ideals, cater to its requests, and forced to adhere to its ways.

A spirit of conformity eventually robs you of your true identity, if you are not aware. Grinded down, some have completely lost the battle for their souls. Attrition warfare, a process of wearing down an opponent has been taking place, 'spiritually'. Your energy has been stolen, bit by bit, to feed an entity that has no decent life force of its own. It has used the adage of the 'common good' or 'keeping the peace' as a tactic against you in its arsenal.

On a global scale, this invisible entity has also been building up an army of soldiers and snipers to use ammunition to fire against its very own comrades.

Covert agents are everywhere residing in the media, government services, the health service, education, and religion.

Death is the outcome. You are the target, and your cooperation is demanded, and not requested.

Common Purpose

A malevolent spirit, which can be experienced in the majority of public workplaces, and for which most people cannot quite fully explain or put their finger upon, is a form of oppression disguised under leadership or change management, that creates a sense of instability and confusion, depending on how many times you go through a process of change. It has been infiltrating society over quite a number of years.

It is not unusual on occasion to detect a very common trend in tactics used through specialized learning and behaviour techniques, such as NLP, which eventually finds you somehow agreeing with an outcome instigated by a friendly facilitator who has already pre-planned the outcome of how you will view and deal with a project.

You can sometimes sense you have been merely 'used' in your association with people who use behaviour techniques, and they are sometimes unaware of the effect and the damage they have created.

This system can rob you of your own individual and creative skills and also rob you of your free will. It will also edify the facilitator into falsely believing they are the new and 'much wiser' leader in society for achieving the desired outcome. Eventually, you learn never to trust them, even though they believe they are leading by example.

It is widely reported that Common Purpose, CP, a political charity, reported to be funded by public money, may be at the root cause of destroying democracy, by selecting personnel who work in the public sector into their leadership programmes to influence and determine their desired change. Using Neuro Linguistic Programming and behavioural techniques, Common Purpose boasts that it trains the future leaders of society, and that at the core of what they do are two strands of thought leadership:

Leading Beyond Authority and Cultural Intelligence (CQ).

If you have noticed over a period of time that public services such as local councils who once served the community have now changed into law enforcers; it may be possible that the senior leaders of those organizations have partaken in common purpose training, and disseminated that work ethos down through the organization and out into society.

It is reported there are now 65,000 CP Alumni worldwide having an impact on the cities they operate in and 4,000 new leaders benefiting from the programme every year.

You can read about the organization here and the global impact it is having upon the world.

And for further information about the exposure of Common Purpose you can read about it below:

[Link One], [Link Two]

Cultural Intelligence training, which also works alongside Emotional Intelligence and considered a vital requirement if you wish to get on in leadership positions; may appear to be a very considerate way of respecting the differences in other cultures or lifestyles in order to work more effectively in business.

However, in effect, is it really about learning how to make a multi-cultural society blend into one, and is it side-lining anyone's beliefs that just may not tie up with common purpose ideals?

Cultural Intelligence talks a lot about your core and your flex. The core is who you are and the beliefs that you have and which should not change. The flex is your adaptability, your knowledge and your consideration towards other cultures in order to work together without changing your core.

However, one does not have to assume what cultural intelligence is, when on a daily basis we personally experience the reality of the very biased consideration which is continually being given to others. The foundations of the British way of life have been sacrificed and it has lost its own identity.

Consider just a few examples of what is really taking place.

The case of Joshua Sutcliffe, a Christian maths teacher at a school in Oxfordshire facing discipline for calling a female student a 'girl' when they wanted to be called a boy. The school has accused Joshua of 'mis-gendering' the pupil contravening the school's equality policy.

Felix Ngole, expelled from his course at Sheffield University for stating his Christian views on marriage and sexual ethics on Facebook. It is thought his views could have offended someone.

Sarah Kuteh a Christian nurse fired by the NHS for talking to patients about her faith while she was helping them get ready for surgery.

Richard Page, a magistrate who has been disciplined by a Cabinet minister and England's highest judge for saying that he thought a child's best interests lie in being raised by a mother and a father.

Barry Trayhorn, a Pentecostal minister forced to resign after a complaint was made about a bible verse he quoted at a prison chapel service.

(These cases are being defended by Christian Concern lawyers)

All of these cases have happened within health, education law, and religion, and are not isolated cases. They happen on a daily basis.

The above people are being punished for their 'beliefs' which can be kept private, but never expressed. They now stand outside the new norms of society, as they have not yet conformed or compromised. They unfortunately will never be able to have enough 'flex' to progress in their careers in society, despite being very gifted and experienced people. They must be punished.

With emotional intelligence, cultural intelligence and social intelligence all being used as a superior standard of interacting with people, the genuine is becoming lost and we live in a false world of caring for each other, whilst destroying each other with lies.

People are suffering under attrition warfare, a sustained process of wearing down an opponent until they physically collapse and they lose the will to fight.

As Christ was crucified on the cross, the truth is being crucified in the UK.

Who will win this War of Attrition, and which side will you stand on, the winner or the losers? Who is your leader, and who are you following?

Bearing Crosses

One of my favourite illustrators was Annie Vallotton, who is best known for her stick figure illustrations which feature in the Good News Bible.

Who would have thought that simple black and white pictures could convey powerful messages; but in Annie's illustrations it would be fair to say that the holy-spirit certainly speaks through them.

The most striking illustration which always intrigues me is one of many people all carrying crosses. In the illustration there are young and old people, and some are very small children. The crosses are also of different sizes. The caption reads:

"he must forget himself, carry his cross, and follow me" Mark (8:34)

The picture indicates we are all carrying some sort of cross in our lives, and a good friend explained to me once that our crosses are made lighter by Christ inside us who bears the heaviest part of that cross for us. I love that. There are sometimes issues in our lives that could crush us if it were not for a strength that is bigger than our own weak selves.

People are very good at wearing crosses, you see them all around you, but they are not very good at carrying their cross or of knowing how to. We talk the talk, but can't walk the walk.

Crosses can make a statement of faith or also a statement of fashion. You sometimes see large diamond studded crosses hanging round a person's neck, and you sometimes see them being paraded down the aisles of a church. But who it is that wears them is not always a true reflection of truth. You see their hypocrisy. Fashion has infiltrated churches and watered down the message of the cross. There are many theologians who are now fashion-statement bearers.

Therefore, discovering the truth, or having the truth revealed to you, for many Christians, has become a singular journey now outside the confines of organized religion, church buildings and fellowship.

The Conversion of the Church of England

_It is very sad to say that if you are looking for answers you will not find them today within the Church of England as a whole. Many Christians have lost all respect for what is known as the General Synod of The Church of England in the UK who can make decisions which, if approved by the Houses of Parliament, can define the law and also influence the spiritual lives of their congregations. Unfortunately, they have failed to convey the message of the gospel and the many people which they should have really helped, stand outside its walls. Weakness is epitomized in many of the clergy who cannot speak the truth in love, or offer hope to people who look for true answers.

It is disappointing that the Archbishop of York, Dr John Sentamu is reported as saying "The sooner the practice of so-called conversion therapy is banned, I can sleep at night".

One might initially think the conversion he speaks of is the conversion of the church, but his remarks are aimed at the counselling and the help that many people seek for unwanted same-sex attraction.

By calling it 'so called conversion', he suggests that people are being forced or manipulated into seeking help to change their nature, rather than return to their basic nature and to what they feel is right. The church, in this respect, overlooks the thousands of people who have found great help and support in talking to someone who understands; which includes people who were sexually abused as children and feel their same-sex attraction is somehow connected to that experience! It includes the many people who feel their need for a father's love became sexualized at some point in their lives. It includes the similarities in a person's childhood or a trauma that can be identified in so many stories, which at least offers some basic understanding of the spiritual war they may be experiencing.

Whereas, proponents of banning this help can recount many stories of people who were not helped by therapy, there are also thousands of stories of people who have been greatly helped and supported in overcoming the desires that they experience.

Should the church be trivializing and dismissing the very real changes that many people want and have experienced. Why are their stories being silenced?

Often opponents to present day therapy will bring up the use of electroconvulsive therapy or castration which was once used against people with homosexual tendencies, but this is not used in modern day counselling. However, ECT, electroconvulsive therapy is still widely used for mental health conditions which can include depression or psychotic episodes. It could be considered to be a violation by any number of people. It may certainly be a cruel answer to a spiritual problem. You can read about how ECT is used today here:

The motion to bring about the banning of therapy was brought to the General Synod by Christian gay rights campaigner Jayne Ozanne stating "the therapy is potentially harmful with no place in the modern world".

But here is the hypocrisy. It is reported the Church of England overwhelmingly called for a ban on such therapy for gay Christians after overwhelmingly affirming transgender people in the church. What sort of double standard is this that would remove the choice from one group of people and then affirm the choice of another, and are they aware that organisations, who offer help for unwanted same-sex, also have to offer help to many trans-gender people who regret the transition that they made?

Children and adults who look for answers as to why they have certain feelings often feel extremely rejected by God. There can be no denying there is a certain amount of suffering and bullying that they may have experienced. Society is cruel on many people for many different reasons. They will however sometimes look to the church or the medical profession for an answer. They should be more consciencous of what they say in the position that they are in. Sadly, they are not.

From strongly criticizing and condoning certain behaviours to affirming or being indifferent to certain behaviours they have failed on both accounts to give the correct understanding, merely because they are fashion statement bearers. There is no real spiritual love in their actions.

Spiritual and physical abuse within religion has destroyed many believers.

Annie Vallotan

When drawing her many sketches for the Good News Bible it is reported than Annie Vallotan would often draw them up to 90 times to get each illustration right. She wanted to make her drawings simple and she wanted to convey the truth. I am only guessing the truth was more important to her because of those repeated efforts that she made. Something wasn't quite right with the picture.

The illustration of the many people all carrying crosses indicates a message which should resonate with many people if they are lovers of the truth, and if they wish to follow Christ.

My understanding is that God loves people who go to him, but he has never told them to stay just as they are Fashion wearer or truth bearer? It is good to have discernment when faced with those wearing crosses who give you advice, if you are really searching for the truth. It really is a matter of life or death. Who do you listen to? Maybe, the still small voice of God himself.

Will you bear your cross, or will you just wear it.....?

Will you sleep easy tonight?

London's Big Ben Is losing It's Gong

Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone,
Prevent the dog from barking with a juicy bone.
Silence the pianos and with muffled drum
Bring out the coffin, let the mourners come.
WH Auden – Funeral Blues

Big Ben is the large clock, situated in the Elizabeth Tower at the north end of the Houses of Parliament in the capital of London. It is one of those iconic buildings by which the United Kingdom is often recognised. No matter where you are in London, Big Ben (which is the nickname for the bell inside the clock) can usually be heard. But on the 21st August, it is about to become silent for 4 years. It has been chiming for almost 160 years, and like the roots of an old oak tree it offers some people a certain sense of comfort and stability. The sound of its gongs as they are sometimes called, are indicative of London and its history.

On British TV a picture of Big Ben and the sound of its gongs have signalled in the evening news on a nightly basis across the nation. It has famously introduced state occasions. It is known for the eleven solemn gongs on Remembrance Day signalling its citizens to remember those who have died in wars; and besides its face on the numerous tourist souvenirs of tea-towels and fridge magnets depicting the London scene, perhaps it is most widely and emotively remembered by the older generation for the famous speech made by Sir Winston Churchill announcing to the world that the war was over on V.E Day in 1945. The three introductory gongs at the significant time of 3.00 p.m. on the afternoon before his announcement are particularly relevant to the occasion.

Therefore the news that Big Ben will have to go silent for four years, due to Health and Safety issues for the workers who have been set with the task of renovating the clock, have raised immediate objections that London, and indeed the UK, would not be the same without its gongs. Some have called it 'PC madness', especially when sufficient ear defenders could be supplied to the workers.

There is a slight panic across the nation. For some British people, that sudden loss of all that is familiar may have suddenly hit home.

What will fill their silence?

Homing in on the issue, the Prime Minister, Theresa May, has also raised her concerns on its silence, along with other notable MP's. It sounds like they couldn't have possibly known this was about to happen, and in their very own house as well! A suggestion has been made that a recording of the gongs set some distance away may be the solution for those who will suffer from the silence of Big Ben, and as a bonus, the health and safety of the workmen will also benefit.

There may be nothing like the 'echo' of times past to give people that false sense of security, regardless of whether it is authentic or false, and there is nothing like a false sense of caring for people too.

So why is our famous tower and clock being dismantled and renovated, and what is the cost? In monetary terms it is £29 million.

But Big Ben and the Elizabeth Tower is not the only British institution which is facing some updating.

Pride and Prejudice

The National Trust, an organization which looks after the conservation of stately homes, gardens, historical sites and landscapes, all of which are very popular tourist attractions for many people in the UK, has been embroiled in rows this year, this time, all connected to political correctness.

Supported by over 70,000 volunteers and maintained largely by the 4.24 million people's membership to the The National Trust, who value their heritage and wish it to be protected; National Trust properties are wonderful places to visit and escape the concrete jungle of urbanism.

However, earlier in the year the organization did not think seriously enough when they decided in their collaboration with chocolate manufacturer 'Cadbury's' that now was the time to go along with removing the word 'Easter' from their annual Easter egg hunt and how much the public would object. Not that the children minded, as they are more interested in the chocolate, but the significance of the subtle advertising and the removal of everything which could possibly refer to Christianity was noticeable even to the most secular. It didn't go un-missed.

Also this year the National Trust who are now marking the 50th anniversary of the partial decriminalisation of homosexuality, and exploring LGBTQ heritage with a programme called Prejudice and Pride at some of its sites, have been accused of forcing their staff to wear gay pride badges, or else be relegated to back room duties.

Now reversing its decision after the news became public, Dame Helen Gosh, the director of the National Trust is reported as still defending the original decision in a letter to the Daily Telegraph which reads:

“Like many heritage organizations, we have taken the opportunity of the 50th anniversary of the partial decriminalization of homosexuality to tell the story at a dozen or so of our properties of the people who lived there and whose personal lives were outside the social norms of their time,”

You can also read about the activities here from the main website on how they are proudly challenging history.

In honesty, I don't really think people are interested in the sexuality of the owner or people who lived in National Trust properties. What people are tired of is being continually indoctrinated and forced into a one world view of sexuality, or else be labelled bigoted. They go to National Trust properties for a nice day out. Sometimes it is like a breath of fresh air to visit and know that the most exciting event you will hear about is how the Gardenia's have grown this year. Is the National Trust so really out of touch?

In a country where we have been told that Christians need re-educating and that the bible and its message is hateful by the organization, Wilton Park, (an executive agency of the Foreign and Commonwealth office) it is also clear to see that another agenda is really taking place which has a dark and sinister motive. It has no real concern for people and like the instigation of gay history in national heritage sites is only using the issue as a form of manipulation and subversion techniques into breaking down society and creating further dissension towards its aim of communist goals.

3 0 Clock in the Afternoon

Big Ben and all that it is meant to represent to people will possibly one day be seen for the very weak representative that it has become despite its expensive make-over. Like the half sunken portrayal of the Statue of Liberty which is depicted in many Armageddon films, the UK is sinking fast and the £29 million renovation project cannot fully rejuvenate all that has been really lost by the UK's insistence of giving up its true heritage and all that is sacred and valuable.

On VE Day when Big Ben struck three and Winston Churchill announced the war was over, he was wrong, even though the event was probably timed to relate to the spiritual event of Christ's completion on the cross and his defeat over evil.

An ongoing spiritual battle still exists for all of our souls. The aim is to take us downwards and not upwards. Many Christians are aware of that battle and how lies can destroy your very being.

Rewriting history and rewriting the bible is a weak attempt at strength. It is the ultimate action of what extreme pride and extreme prejudice really is.

Interesting Facts we have forgotten:

In 1940 the Silent Minute was introduced. Before the 9pm BBC radio news was broadcast each night, members of the public were encouraged to dedicate silent contemplation and prayer to those on the battlefields, for the 60 seconds that Big Ben would chime.

*The 15 minute chimes from Big Ben have lyrics.
All through this hour/Lord be my guide/And by thy power/No foot shall slide.*

The Liberty Bell and Big Ben were cast by the same bell foundry – and both have cracks!

Baby Charlie Gard Story And The Culture Of Death

Last week, I visited a very pretty little church in Northern Italy. It wasn't your usual ornate church which you inevitably see in almost every town. A simple wooden cross stood in the grounds, there were stunning views across a crystal blue lake, and there was an open air gallery of faded murals which depicted the 12 Stations of the Cross.

To reach the church you climb some very steep steps which lead off a small side street away from the main promenade of the town. The air and the view become lighter and brighter as you ascend; but as you walk and pause at each station of the cross, depending on your understanding, you become acutely aware of suffering, of indignity, injustice, and of the cruelty of man.

Christ's murder had to be the most cruel and undignified way of dying.

The sweetness of just standing there in those beautiful surroundings, in the open air, free from the constraints of brick and mortar, ritual and words, with the realization of what he overcame and what he did, had an instant healing affect. There is a deep and meaningful message in silence which only he can convey to the human heart at times. It stands in deep contrast to what the world's view of love really is, and what it prides itself upon.

Visions, Values and Beliefs

The current global furore surrounding baby Charlie Gard, who is currently in Great Ormond Street Hospital, London, silently waiting to die, after doctors have said there is nothing more they can do for him, has once more raised some serious questions in our attitudes towards suffering. It has also raised some questions about our National Health Service for many people.

There is a lot of discussion about compassion and dignity towards others. There is also a lot of frustration being experienced by the public that the parents of Charlie have been denied the opportunity by the legal systems to take their son to America to try a new experimental treatment for him.

There also appears to be a global debate taking place, not least in British newspapers. There is a divide on whether we should trust medical experts at Great Ormond Street Hospital and let Charlie 'die with dignity', or if the parents should have been allowed to take their son to America.

Thumbs up for yes, and thumbs down for no.

It all seems really sick and cynical when you think of his parents, and the anguish they are experiencing. A decision has already been enforced. Did they really have an option?

Surely, under these circumstances, the decision for Charlie's health should have rested with his parents. He is their son. It has also been reported that they are not allowed to take Charlie home to die.

However, social media and the mainstream media are also playing a pivotal role in alerting us to something else. It is the power and the authority that the government uses in what is called socialized medicine in relation to our children which is coming to the forefront. Whereas, we once believed and trusted in the advice of doctors, a dictatorship appears to have been visibly rising which determines the outcome of health, outside of parental control.

It is not unusual to daily read of people who have been denied treatment because of the expense to the NHS, or to hear of desperate parents raising money to try alternative treatment available in America. Although the British public pay all their lives from their taxes for national health care, the system is run and governed by the government.

Was the decision about Charlie about compassion, money or power?

Socialized Medicine: "A system for providing medical and hospital care for all at a nominal cost by means of government regulation of health services and subsidies derived from taxation".

The American Heritage® Science Dictionary. Retrieved July 6, 2017 from Dictionary.com website.

When I read about the plight of the parents of Charlie Gard who had been denied the right to do what they could for their son, it also reminded me of the case of Ashya King who I wrote about some years ago, whose parents were the victims of an international hunt after they removed their son from a hospital in Southampton, without the doctors permission, and took him to Prague for Proton Beam Therapy which had also been denied him in the UK.

Social media had been adept at highlighting the cruel way in which the family had been treated during that time when they had been arrested and locked up in a Spanish prison. It was an embarrassing unfortunate case for the UK, which was very quickly covered up by the government's intervention to then help them.

Labelled as irresponsible for putting their son's life in danger, there was evidence of a certain 'power' and an 'authority' which had been exercised in over-riding the parent's wishes, and actually arresting them. So what is going on and do we really show compassion and dignity to those who are vulnerable and suffering or do these concepts of dignity and compassion really cover up a cruel system of power over its people?

Our Culture Of Death

As I turned the pages of a well known British Newspaper to read of the plight of baby Charlie, it was sad to see the love and the sorrow in the face of Mr Gard as he cradled his very poorly son.

On the next page of the paper was a picture of tennis player Serena Williams in the famous iconic nude pose now portrayed fashionably by celebrities who publicly wish to show off their baby bump.

And on the next page of the paper was the story and photograph of a transgender couple who have been allowed to not state the gender of their baby on the birth certificate until their baby is old enough to decide what they want to be themselves.

There were some very mixed and confusing messages in those particular images as I travelled along its pages.

And in a country where we are seriously considering and debating the abortion of babies up to full term for whatever reason, are we really a nation of compassionate and thoughtful people towards children.

A Matter of Inconvenience

Attacking human life, rather than preserving and protecting all human life, the term of 'Antiquated' and 'Victorian', was used quite recently in the House of Lords to pass its first reading to completely decriminalize abortion.

The ten minute rule bill led by Labour MP Diana Johnson and backed by the abortion industry BPAS cited section 58 and 59 of the 1861 Offences against the Person Act as being outdated and unfair. It was reported that it was passed when women didn't even have the vote and was not in line with modern day Britain!

Currently under this section women can be punishable by imprisonment if they bring about their own abortion; something which is often done by women purchasing on-line abortion pills.

From The Guardian, reporting on the bill, it states;

Johnson argued that the law was unfair and inappropriate in an age when women can and will access abortion pills by post because they want to be able to terminate their pregnancy in the privacy of their own home. [Link One] and [Link two]

Whilst Diana Johnson believes she is speaking on behalf of women in modern day Britain, progressing from an antiquated Victorian era, some men and women may also be shocked to know that the NHS has paid out £70 million pounds over the last five years to parents who would have aborted their baby if they had known their child would be born with a disability, and also to parents whose child has survived an abortion. And this they call progress.

Known under the controversial term of 'wrongful birth' there is a great deal of controversy and division about taxpayers funding a culture which appears to promote disability as inconvenient.

In the Still of the Night

Sometimes, you have to inwardly leave the world of madness and cruel injustice to be still and find peace. The air is fresher and much higher up there. It is the place where true love resides.

Christ knew it. His death was cruel but his life exemplified the real meaning of dignity.

In conclusion, whatever the outcome for baby Charlie, many people around the world are praying for him and his parents.

We hope their lives have been touched by the simple gestures; the hand up and the offer of hope and understanding amidst a cruel and twisted world of sickening contradictions.

Katy Perry Leads Us In Prayer

(These are my views as a woman living in England, on how the culture and spirit of my country has changed over 50 years. Why the country does not feel protected or strong any more, how it has lost, and is losing its values and decency, and how we are daily losing our free speech).

It's all a bit of fun really, isn't it, a bit of light hearted relief; the occult symbolism, the provocative music and lyrics, the worship to the devil, the sexual enactments and the one eyed sullen gestures?

This is the signature tune and the make-up of some of the most successful singers and celebrities that people adore around the world today.

However, gone is the laughter when horror really strikes home; and with a reported 22 people dead, one of which is an 8 year old child, and 59 people injured in the recent 'ISIS' attack at an Ariana Grande concert in Manchester, UK, how strangely hypocritical and ironic that in the first instance people are meant to be comforted in knowing that their celebrities, the ones who have sold their souls, to be at the very top of the pyramid, are busy tweeting their prayers in a very trendy way for those who have suffered. It makes you want to weep.

There will also be the same shallowness, and empty verse, displayed throughout our country in the coming days ahead. People who don't usually have one good thing to say about God will be suddenly sending in their prayers. We will all hear about not giving up our British values. Something we did a long time ago when we fell away from our most basic of Christian values. There will be the usual denial, the false solidarity, and the 'we shall overcome terrorism' rhetoric. It is very predictable. It will not give comfort to those who really ache.

On the ground, and much more in tune with the reality of what evil does, the picker uppers, the one's who mop the blood and guts up, the bad news breakers, the ones who grieve, and the embalmers and the undertakers will silently go one way or the other.

Only a real longing for the truth and sometimes the shock of what evil really does to you can break us away from our unhealthy allegiance with another world, the one that is not being created by God. This is a world that offers false comfort and denies that it has opened its doors, literally and spiritually for all types of evil and worship to enter.

True prayer will often come in those truly dark still places of hopelessness. It often happens when you are quite alone.

Which God do you pray to and who will you allow to lead and comfort you?

OMG

It was not unusual to hear the familiar cries of 'O my God' as a sign of shock when young people ran away from the fear that they were faced with at the Ariana Grande concert. It is a cry deep inside many people, which unfortunately gets forgotten once they re-enter back into our own created world after such tragic or frightening events. How many will still be calling out to him today or even thanking him that they made it out? How many will be tweeting about their broken heels, the bus they missed, or the next collective worship of celebrity idolatry they intend to visit in defiance of the fear they were subjected to?

The attack in Manchester will also be hailed as a false flag event, or an elaboration of what really happened, designed to create further fear in our country. Sadly, if we read about world events, it does not deter from the fact that people get intentionally murdered by Islamic extremists in very cruel and horrific ways almost every day. Neither does it deter from the fact that people worship evil and commit evil in their own lives, no matter how subtle or innocent it all may appear to us.

On this small island once thought to be 'great' there is a misplaced faith, and very little strength left. The group collectiveness of sorrow which we now witness after such events is frighteningly weak pretending to be strong. How can the tweets of prayers and strength from celebrities who will very soon be giving worship once more to an evil side of an industry which has given them their fame really help the grieving and very ordinary people of Manchester?

Coronation Street

Outside of Manchester, which is about 90 miles from my home, people from all across the country will also escape into their favourite TV soap this week called Coronation Street, which has been running almost nightly for over 55 years. Set in the cobbled streets of Weatherfield, Manchester, and also filmed from studios in Manchester, Coronation Street, is meant to depict everyday working life. It has possibly covered every single social issue you can think of. Abuse, euthanasia, abortion, homosexuality, sexual exploitation, domestic violence etc have all been covered and projected into every British home if you happen to have become addicted to what is called Britain's most best loved and watched TV programme. Although deemed heroic for covering such sensitive topics Coronation Street has also played a pivotal role in altering the minds of how people should perceive such issues.

The central meeting place in Coronation Street, is a pub, called the Rovers Return. Here the locals discuss the stresses of the day, every day, over a pint of mild or bitter. Everyone who is British will know or will have heard about the Rovers Return. We have coach trips and excursions to the Rovers Return. This is the new church, the drinking hole and the comfort stop for all of our cares and worries.

Whilst typically English and very indicative of how life can be in these small ordinary places, the reality of the topics they cover, albeit contrived, is reflective of the demise and displacement of how life has really become in the United Kingdom.

I wonder if they will one day cover the storyline of how displacement and their fall away from Christian principles has turned Manchester, one of our major cities, into one of the saddest and fearful places to be today.

At a time when many people only want to hear what celebrities and the world wants to portray, please can I thank people who wrote to me from America, about the attack in Manchester, and who have read some of my articles on NewsWithViews.com. In our dark world, the voice of God, and the truth from across the way in America is very heartening and encouraging to me to receive. Thank you very much.

I flew into Manchester airport not long ago. As you see the crowded city coming into view you also love to see the patchwork carpet of green fields which surrounds so many of our cities and which is so familiar and unique to me. A part of me still loves what we call this island race, and what I call my home, but I am sad at it's demise and what I see happening and what I see coming.

The population of Manchester is estimated at 532,000 and there are meant to be just 15 per cent of Muslims who live there. However, there are 62 mosques in Manchester. One of those mosques is Didsbury Mosque. Didsbury Mosque was once called Albert Park Methodist Chapel and was dedicated to Christian worship. Like many churches across the UK it was sold. Now we see many of those beautiful buildings often paid for by the worshippers who attended there turned into supermarkets, private homes or mosques. The irony of Didsbury Mosque which is also the Islamic Centre of Manchester was the mosque that Salman Abedi, the Manchester bomber attended.

The sadness that the UK experiences today is not only a reflection of those lives lost at the event in Manchester, but on a deeper level it should be a reflection of what we have given up and fallen away from morally and spiritually. We have sold our souls. This has been aided and abetting by those who today still continue to promote 'new British values'. Our politicians and some of our churchmen have let us down very badly.

Yet, if you don't believe in Islam, and you don't believe in Jesus Christ, never mind, you will still have Katy Perry.

Lord have mercy on our souls.....

Then the cities of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem will go and cry to the gods to whom they make offerings, but they cannot save them in the time of their trouble.

Anger and kindness can kill

“Those who cry the loudest are not always the ones who are hurt the most” – Aesop

Just for once, I didn't have to be personally present to witness or understand the anger at the Women's anti-Trump march recently held in London. I have suffered with frustration and anger, I have seen the damage it can cause, and I also recognise it in others. It is an ugly spirit. It is usually loud, indignant and demanding; sometimes it hides behind a quiet demeanour, victim hood, tears, or a painted smile. There is a lot of it about.

However, with barely one foot through the front door of The White House, it still came as a bit of a surprise that an exaggerated 100,000 angry women's voices would be on him like a ton of bricks from this side of the Atlantic, and that the event would be heavily covered through all of our mainstream media. The new president of the United States, is suddenly not only responsible for offending the minority of voters in the USA, and creating world division; but he is now apparently responsible for every woman's anguish here in the UK and across the world as well. I hope he has broad shoulders.

Jumping on the bandwagon of what some call group solidarity for all those people who think they are marginalized or feel deeply offended by laws being implemented on the other side of the Atlantic; there were plenty of others across the nation, from the comfort of their own home, who were being empowered by joining in with the criticism, the hatred, and the disbelief directed towards the new president of the United States who they consider to be against women and also very racist towards immigrants. I heard it in the workplace, in shops, at friend's homes, and witnessed the sudden outage of indignation verbalizing itself at every conceivable moment. It was quite astonishing to hear that once more, especially after the Brexit result, and to see it displayed amidst the quiet acceptance and respect that many others felt towards the majority of voters in the USA.

Yet my observations came not only from watching the display of female anguish marching through the streets of London, believing they spoke for the nation, but from asking why this very large group of protestors, if they were concerned about women, were not directing their energy against the real perpetrators of abuse in our society today? There are plenty of them about. What has Donald Trump had to do with it?

Sometimes, it's not those women who cry loudest who are the ones who are most hurt.....They are usually the ones who are most wrong.

Was Donald Trump acting as a catalyst for something else; an unhealed anguish deeply forgotten and buried? Why haven't we witnessed such hatred for male leaders; home and abroad before?

Why did this anger turn itself against one man, without looking at its own guilt, and the wrong compromises it has already made with evil within its own home?

Silent Witness – The Missing Women

If demonstrators were upset about the unfair way that women are treated, I wondered why they were not around when just one British woman bought out a private prosecution against 2 male doctors who were discovered carrying out abortions on unborn baby girls in the UK, based purely on their gender. With an estimated 100,000,000 missing women based solely on the practice of gendercide across the world, it should surely be something worth speaking out against.

What a wonderful platform some of those speakers in that demonstration could have had to highlight that abuse in our own country. [Link]

Silent Witness – The Invisible Mother

I wondered if 100,000 demonstrators will march or speak out on the removal of the name 'mothers' which is now being called for by the BMA, (The British Medical Association), who have issued official internal guidelines to all of its members to implement and refer to a new mother as a 'pregnant person', thus removing the unique gift, joy and privilege of being called a mother; in order to not offend others.

The guidelines also promote the new title of Mx which can be used instead of Miss, Ms, Mrs or Mr. It will not be a Happy Mx Day when that suggestion finally takes a hold.

The road to genderless, non descript, non identifiable 'nobodies' is upon us. Will we question or blindly comply with these instructions?

You can read A Guide to Effective Communication, Inclusive Language in the Workplace issued by The British Medical Association.

Silent Witness – The Invisible Child

I wondered why 100,000 demonstrators have not vocally objected in the streets to the sexualizing of children through the promotion of soft porn through music videos, where a little girls ambition in life has now become demoted to using the power of her assets to become a sex symbol like Rhianna, Beyonce or Britney and little boy's are trained early to see girls as pure objects for their desire?

Passing their antics off as powerful and liberating is an insult to women, but more alarmingly it is feeding a more sinister and abusive agenda to make sex and provocative behaviour in children, especially little girls, much more acceptable.

It was interesting to see some of the more provocative female celebrities being the ones to shout the loudest in some of the organized marches across the world.

Silent Witness – Human Chattel

However, most of all I have wondered why those 100,000 demonstrators have not focused their energy into something which would be helpful and expose the evil of human trafficking in the UK, the rising number of rapes across Europe, child slavery, child brides, forced marriage, honour based violence, and FGM, (female genital mutilation) which is highlighted as a cultural problem and where it is estimated that the number of girls and women who have undergone FGM in the UK is estimated to vary from anything from 66,000 to 280,000 with between 7,000 to 24,000 girls under 17 years of age at risk?

The slogan currently being used to highlight FGM is No Voice – No Choice.

As the Women's anti-Trump movement in the UK now takes a stance against his restrictions on immigration and travel to the USA, with demonstrations up and down the country in many of the major cities, I refer to two of the many signs that I have witnessed in these rallies which reads:

'Kindness is Everything'

'Your cannot unify with Hate'

Promoting humanism in a country which is already divided, not through the efforts of Donald Trump, but by another system which has purposefully overcrowded one culture with another culture, people are already aware that their kindness has been mis-used.

Apart from genuine immigrants and refugees who have integrated over many years into the UK, who are friends to the UK, and consider themselves British; unfortunately there are many legal and illegal immigrants who are not so friendly now living within our society.

Many places in Europe have fallen backwards and become unrecognisable; there are many places where people, especially women, are very afraid to visit. There is no kindness or unity there.

An area known as Tower Hamlets is known to be one of the most dangerous places for women and girls in the east end of London.

You can read the 45 page document on the abuse against women and girls in Tower Hamlets.

Tower Hamlets is also known as one of the 'no-go' areas which are reportedly existing throughout the United Kingdom where people do not feel safe or protected anymore.

In an article by Soeren Khan from the Gatestone Institute in relation to European 'no-go' zones, fact or fiction; here are some of the comments from people who speak out against some of the areas which now populate the British Isles.

The article also speaks about how many people are desperately leaving some areas in which they feel that the British law, culture and values are being dominantly displaced by cultures which want to police themselves and others, rather than follow the law of the land. [Link]

- "There are some communities born under other skies who will not involve the police at all... there are communities from other cultures who would prefer to police themselves." – Sir Tom Winsor, chief inspector of the police forces in England and Wales.
- "We are sleepwalking our way to segregation. We are becoming strangers to each other and leaving communities to be marooned outside the mainstream." – Trevor Phillips, former chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality.
- "One of the results of [multiculturalism] has been to further alienate the young from the nation in which they were growing up and also to turn already separate communities into 'no-go' areas where adherence to this ideology [of Islamic extremism] has become a mark of acceptability." Michael Nazir-Ali, former Bishop of Rochester.

- "There are things that I see when I'm driving around Birmingham that shouldn't be happening. I only drive into these areas, never actually walk into these areas, I just wouldn't. Just in case I did do something that...because of their culture or their religion it was a threat or it was an insult or something." – Resident of Birmingham.

Who will fill the Void?

The protestors in the Women's anti-Trump march I fear are being used in varying ways. An out-of-control reaction, an anger, by the protesters is creating an irrational and biased attack upon a president who may be initially daring to prioritize the safety of his own fellow citizens first, and it is also acting as a distraction against some of the real issues that we should all be talking about and not be shouted down upon in our own country. It is not racist to highlight such problems.

The real anguish which some women feel is that they do not feel safe, or protected in society. They feel badly let down by men, even the good ones. It was all very well to march in large numbers through a relatively safe street in London. It is not so nice to walk alone in places of society where no one cares for you.

When we no longer identify or respect the specific and special roles that each of the sexes possess, society becomes demoralized so low that it loses all respect for itself and each other, and becomes very weak. It does not recognise genuine strength, love or grace.

You can sense and see the growing weakness and lack of character and identity all around. Who is it that is orchestrating the demise of mankind and why do we have to be considered unkind to object to it?

Will men and women unite together and value their role in society, protect their children and stand up to evil in a rational way without falling prey to the political correctness and humanism which is destroying people?

Out of control anger, like over the top kindness, can kill people. The women's anti-trump demonstration was a weak attempt at the countries collective failure to show true strength and kindness in the correct proportion when it should have done a long long time ago. Leaders have let us down.

Is it to late to turn back to a dignity now lost...?

Satanism, child abuse, political correctness and silence

The Midnight Cry

“It was a tremendous rumbling sound and all the school went dead. You could hear a pin drop. Everyone just froze in their seats. I just managed to get up and I reached the end of my desk when the sound got louder and nearer, until I could see the black out of the window. I can't remember any more but I woke up to find that a horrible nightmare had just begun in front of my eyes” -Gaynor Minett

The Welsh mining town of Aberfan lost their children en-mass on that fateful day in 1966. It has been 50 years ago, but the heartbreaking images of parent and rescuer digging and scrambling through the tons of black slurry that had suffocated teacher and child as an avalanche of waste thundered down the hillside on to Pantglas Junior School, is something that many people can still vividly recall.

For 50 years prior to the incident, the mountain waste made up of millions of tonnes of mining debris had been steadily growing and for almost as long the numerous petitions for its removal had also increased. It appears to have been one of those constant battles that we daily witness between sensibility and indifference, where indifference blindly persists and the common sense approach is dismissed, until it is ground down into submission.

Today, for those living in Aberfan, and for all those who survived, there is a daily reminder apart from the annual memorials and missed anniversaries that there are 116 children's graves all bearing the same premature date of demise. There is also the constant remembrance of the unexpected, the unbelievable, yet the forewarned tragedy just waiting to happen. Could they have done more?

One parent whose child died in the disaster asked that it be recorded that the cause of death was "Buried Alive by the National Coal Board"

From others, and the memory of what happened at Aberfan, it is sadly reflected by John Adams as he writes:

I was 14 at the time of the Aberfan disaster. My school was very religious, and I had been trying to decide how much I believed in God. When the disaster struck it was the talk of the school, and in many of the classes we found ourselves discussing it with our teachers. We particularly wanted to know why God would allow so many children to die. The teachers had no answer. I turned away from the idea that there is a God. And that's my view, to this day. [Read]

Mr Adams wrote a reflective account of how he now experiences God and it is how many people feel when disaster strikes. Indeed, if people are genuinely honest with themselves there is a rejection and a deep resentment within them for even the smallest of slights against a being that we are told loves us.

Deeper questions on the relevance of an intelligent force of Good which appears to allow disaster, against an intelligent force of Evil creating disaster are rarely discussed.

Yet today more than ever we are witnessing the unleashing of evil in all its forms in a way that is obviously not hiding from us. Like the mountain of black slurry that was piling up on the hillside of Aberfan, it is in full open view. It is slithering its way in to every persons home, school and church at rapid speed. Why can't everyone see it, and why do some people promote and protect it?

We are told evil comes to kill, steal and destroy every man, woman and child who has a destiny. We have an adversary. Realizing there is some type of intelligent force orchestrating our demise is probably one of the most frightening revelations you can experience. Realizing there is an intelligent force which can operate with extreme subtlety and patience, precision and planning, and which can also use you to destroy others is equally disturbing.

In your midnight cry, the point at which you discover you have been tricked, duped, used or abused, you must make certain that you do not reject the intelligence that wants to help you, who has revealed this to you in the light of his presence; otherwise you will have embraced what evil has set out to accomplish.

In typical Star Wars terminology you will have crossed to the other side.

The battle for the soul starts from birth.

Abortion on Demand – Whatever the Reason

In a world where abortion has for the main part been legalized in so many countries, we still live in a world where the ugly reality of gender abortion (mainly the killing of baby girls) still brings up some pretty startling reactions. Even those who believe in the women's choice to abort a child can still show some flicker of reluctance to the fact that female babies can be purposefully disposed of based purely on their sex and their liability in a culture that views men and women in this fashion.

With the implementation of ultra-sonography machines which have become much more advanced in scanning the 'well-being' of a baby we have also now become very used to a culture of knowing the sex of a child before their birth through the 3D images that ultra-scanning machines provide.

However, who would have ever thought that a 'blind eye' would be turned against sex-selective abortion here in the UK and that we might be unaware of just how many sex-selective abortions have been taking place based on the outcomes of providing parents with this information.

In an undercover investigation in 2012 it is reported that Manchester based Dr Prabha Sivaraman and Birmingham based Dr Palaniappan Rajmohan were secretly filmed and recorded offering abortions to women who stated they didn't want their children based on the fact they were girls.

A private prosecution bought against the doctors carrying out this illegal practice by a Christian woman, 23 year old Aisling Hubert, now sees Miss Hubert with a bill of £36,000 plus costs of £11,000, after the case against the two doctors was dropped and it deemed not in the 'public interest' to proceed with the case.

Aisling Hubert is currently expected to attend court to explain why she cannot pay the charges made against her.

You can read about the full case here.

Currently, the UK has different policies within different NHS trusts on whether they will allow parents to know the sex of their unborn child or not. This is based on the reality of sex-selective abortions which is known to exist in this country and also private prosecutions being made against hospitals who may give out the wrong details. Private organizations will however carry out a sonogram to provide parents with this information and many expectant parents will take this option. [\[Read\]](#), [\[Read\]](#)

The New Normal

Sex-selective abortions however may not become such a problem one day if the heavy promotion in 'non identification' of being born a boy or a girl fully takes a grip. Removing the value of who we really are in some type of consideration to what we might one day 'identify' with is being played out on young impressionable and suggestive souls.

Despite warnings against the abuse being imposed upon children through graphic sex-education in our schools, with an emphasis on pleasure; the promotion of a 'new normal' way of identifying with your own feelings is now being directed towards children of primary school age. What and who are we offering our children up to?

Already, we are now hearing of a rise in children telephoning the UK charity Childline and NSPCC with very young children confused about who they really are. The numbers have reportedly doubled in the last 12 months. [Read]

I have personally heard of a little girl who just because she likes football now experiences a belief that she is 'gay' through the propaganda she receives from school, and it was reported recently that one little boy aged 4 has been allowed to dress as a girl since he was 2 years old because of gender dysphoria whilst his 'twin' brother dresses as a boy. It is not an isolated case, although it is one of the youngest cases to be reported here in the UK. Does it really matter? [Read]

Many people reported on the article that genuine compassion and understanding should be directed towards any child with such issues, but imposing and promoting acceptance on sexuality at such tender ages like it doesn't matter, is creating a distorted and dangerous view which could harm a child in later life. Those petitioning for such acceptance selectively remove or condemn any counter-acting scientific evidence provided against the danger.

Whilst the child's mother believes we should talk about such matters, we live in a world that rarely reports, wants to know, and even vehemently silences the reporting of transgender/transition regret. There is a very high incidence in people who transition; but still do not find the happiness they think will discover from trying to change their bodies.

In a 1973 – 2003 study in Sweden on 324 sex re-assigned persons the conclusions following the procedures were found to be that there were even higher “risks for mortality and suicidal behavior” You can read the report here.

Could the problem and the answer be a spiritual one – rather than a physical one?

Author Walt Heyer, from his website ‘Sex Change Regret’ also offers a wealth of information with links to research and factual evidence that people need to know. He writes: “Most will grow out of the dysphoria. Isn’t there some way to work through the distress rather than experimenting on our children”?

Interestingly, you will also find that many people who are considered LGBT have also distanced themselves from identifying with this type of promotion in our schools and society.

These are surely matters to speak about, but sadly a politically correct system of silencing such issues by labeling any type of objection as ‘radical or hateful’ is allowing a false sense of guilt to enter in into how we care for each other. It leads to ‘indifference’ and ‘chance’; a hope that your child may just escape the experiment or develop new ways of ‘loving’ which is a contradiction to the right way of loving or caring for others.

The Final Hour

With child sex abuse scandals literally swarming the news in the UK, some people are now realizing that child sex abuse is much more prevalent and wide-spread than they could ever have imagined; and it is very difficult to comprehend that so many people in such prominent positions can be party to such horrific crimes. Child sex abuse, once thought to be the rare chance act of a locally disturbed unknown is being uncovered within religions, schools, parliament, public offices and entertainment by people of whom we have sometimes considered to be of high standing.

Our latest scandal to be revealed in the UK has been within the football industry with over 55 football clubs currently being investigated on historical sex abuse claims which may have been happening since the 1970's.

The lid of the pit was opened when ex footballer Gary Johnson revealed he has signed a confidentiality agreement and received payment from Chelsea football club, after being groomed and repeatedly abused as a boy from the age of 11 by a well known football coach.

With the knowledge we now have on how child abusers can groom a child, is it right that we are now allowing the grooming, confusing and sexualizing of children in our schools under the disguise of 'sex education' to carry on?

Child abuse is also often linked to the occult or the evil arts as they were once know. For the most part, this is unknown about and kept away from the public. It is very difficult to understand and read about, yet we are seeing many connections with known sex offenders, as for example Jimmy Saville, (awarded an OBE by the queen) who was connected to the occult, satanic rituals and ritual child abuse and sacrifice.

If you do not believe in God, then you must be aware that evil really does exist if you can bear to read the history of one of the UK's worse sex offenders, and know that people protected it, rewarded it and worshiped it.

The recent media bewilderment expressed in regards to the ceremony to 'celebrate' the opening of the Gotthard Tunnel in Europe, was a blatant satanic ritual attended by people who once more not only took part in the event but enjoyed it and even turned a blind eye to it. The event was labeled 'glitzy' and explained away as being a portrayal of North-South reconciliation

Culture is becoming transformed by dark, introverted and distorted imagery and symbolism, passing itself off as light and calling itself 'glitzy'

Consider that the ceremony portrayed the mine workers who built the tunnel as zombies, and that a sacrificial lamb (symbolizing Christ) is made to a goat demon who mockingly then mates with the spirits of dead miners. There is a spiritually significant message in this ceremony indicating that evil 'lives off' the life force of others.

Consider the ceremony was attended by heads of state who gave the performance a standing ovation. [Read more here]

Remembering Kenneth Hayes

The Rev Kenneth Hayes was 36 years old and was the minister of Zion English Baptist Church in Aberfan in 1966. Despite losing his own little boy in the black landslide, he reportedly preached the day after the tragedy and in the years that followed continued to encourage and help all of the grieving families in the village through the example of his own unshakeable faith in a loving God and a life thereafter.

I believe, despite his own grief, he will have undoubtedly brought some light and hope into the darkness which smothered 'Aberfan', a tiny welsh village whose people still bears many mental scars.

He also reportedly never stopped speaking up about the removal of the black tip which killed 144 people and later headed a campaign to remove remaining tips. One of the greatest scandals known about in the UK was the coal board being allowed to take money from the disaster fund set up for the victims to remove the tips. Years of petitioning by Kenneth Hayes saw the money returned in 1997.

The penalizing of Aisling Hubert for seeking justice; the biased reporting on transgender issues; the unknown numbers of children in sex-selective abortions; rife and ritual child sex abuse. We should be connecting the dots and wondering if it is purely coincidence or part of an evil course that is sacrificing our children.

How do you stop the landslide, and who will ask if there is an intelligent force of evil creating disaster and speak out against a politically correct system protecting it? Removing common sense and the silencing of speech is making millions of children vulnerable. Fifty years on from Aberfan and nothing has changed. Where are people like Kenneth Hayes and where do they turn too in their own midnight cry?

In that silence you couldn't hear a bird or a child. -George Williams

A picture can paint a thousand words

Last week a friend gave me a copy of an old German painting called Det Breite und det Schmale Weg. Translated it means 'The Broad and the Narrow Way'. I had noticed a framed edition on her kitchen wall and my attention had been continually drawn to it. There was a certain pain and a certain hope entwined within it.

Designed by Charlotte Reihlen of Stuttgart in 1862 it was then painted by Herr Schacher also from Stuttgart, and later editions were produced in Holland in 1866.

Aside from the two obvious paths depicted in the picture, and although there are English editions, a German translation book and a magnifying glass revealed minute and interesting details in many of the figures. There were scriptural references under some of the scenes. The images were so comparable in how we personally experience life today.

Of course the broad and narrow way is sometimes discussed within religious parlance; and there is a belief that only a few are seriously on the narrow way to life eternal.

Outside of that discussion, the way to heaven is wide.

Everyone thinks they are going there.

Today, so many people are compromising themselves through their very own interpretation on what constitutes the 'right' way of living by listening to people who they believe to be experts, religious scholars, enlightened masters, mentors and church leaders. It is troubling. Choice sections of scripture are often being randomly used to edify, justify or debilitate another. Coming from the wrong people, even if they are well intentioned, they are also turning people away, rather than bringing people to any real meaning or understanding of life.

It appears Christianity within the United Kingdom has never been so mixed up, so confusing, and so hypocritical as it is today. If people have lost all respect for Christianity, and are moving away from it, it is some of the religious leaders of our day and the church itself which has also encouraged and enforced that viewpoint.

Outside of organized religion, which also includes the mass importation from America of the Church Growth Movement, and the Purpose Driven Life process, some people are just going their own way. They have either lost their faith altogether, chosen the humanistic route of appearing more loving, they meet in small groups, or are often just alone.

Remote internet friendships are also becoming much more valued as a separation between the obvious decadent life of destruction and the false life found within so many churches drives them to seek more honest contact.

Could this really be the narrow way of life?

One Solitary Life

Maybe it was cynicism, or maybe it was pain and rejection, that has also seen others get deeply drawn away to quietly follow and listen to a voice of truth, rather than to the constant noise and legalism which seemed to be in direct contradiction to something which lay deep inside their hearts.

And if Christ came with a sword to divide, rather than a plan to unite all people together, then there is a very strange plan taking shape within the main religions. Is it good or is it bad? A translation book and a magnifying glass could be useful.

Revelations seven letters to the seven churches could also be relevant to Christian people today. Who is taking notice?

An article written by John Bingham, religious affairs officer for the Telegraph states: "Representatives of almost a dozen congregations in the Home Counties are due to gather in a church hall in Tunbridge Wells, Kent, later this week for the first session of what that say could eventually develop into an alternative Anglican church in England"

Whilst disagreement and opposition publicly rage across the nation within the Anglican church based on its differences mainly towards marriage and homosexuality, and the watering down of the bible; many parishes are preparing to split away in an attempt to hold to the truths of the bible against the ever increasing compromises that the Church of England are continually making on these issues.

Using this crisis and more precisely 'using' all of the divisions that they created themselves, manipulators under another agenda are taking full advantage of the situation to now call for 'unity'. This conveniently falls under the popular concept of co-existence.

Promoting this unity the Archbishop of Canterbury, Justin Welby, recently gave a very encouraging message to Muslims at the end of Ramadan this year which you can watch here. He is careful not to mention the name of Christ in his message as the way to God, but as in all interfaith interactions there is the mention of the word 'common' as in common good, instigating that in our common humanity all ways and roads lead to God.

However, it seems that it is only the Christian faith that is adapting and changing itself so rapidly in relation to all of the other religions who, in comparison, gain a certain respect by adhering rigidly and even forcibly to their own particular beliefs.

And whilst Justin Welby also made a statement earlier this year saying he was deeply sorry on behalf of the Anglican Church on how people were being persecuted for their sexuality, a strange silence from other faith groups still seems to reign regarding the barbaric ways people who are found to be gay are treated, most especially in African countries. You can read the full article and listen to his speech here.

Lights along the Way

Maybe A W Tozer knew what he was talking about when he wrote The Loneliness of the Christian and a walk that would result in people taking themselves away from the fellowship of good Christians as well as from that of the unregenerate world.

Nevertheless, it is good to see that there are genuine lights and over-comers from all walks of life, and there are at least a handful of true ministers who are not afraid to speak the truth and more importantly provide the antidote to us all in ways that offer true understanding.

Not giving in and embracing that which is wrong in us needs encouragement and compassion – not compromise.

The compromising church, like the seeker friendly church, which is so prevalent in the United Kingdom today, are not always the loving places they should be. They can be addictive for the feel good factor in comparison to the singular path which is much more difficult to take.

Preying on the statement of 'united we stand, divided we fall', ironically also used by Winston Churchill in 1941 in a speech broadcast from London to the United States; those currently promoting unity have initially really divided and conquered Christianity in order to build up a new type of religion.

Maybe a quote by Polydorus of Sparta explains things much more succinctly if we do not show caution in what we embrace.

"If you adopt your enemy's religion you are enslaved. If you breed with your enemy you are destroyed".

So which way do you go, the broad way of 'unity' and us all being one, or the 'way' of Christ? There is no other way. It is certainly something to think upon.

If you look inside yourself at the pain you feel when you discover you have compromised yourself too much with the wishes of others and the wishes of the world you may find an answer.

Futility or stability

Just when the world tempts you with a little bit of encouragement, along comes a sting, an attack, a short sharp shock, or an injustice, to try and knock the shine right out of your joy, and throw you straight back in to a cycle of confusion. It is now happening daily. It is a good lesson in observing how such tactics can be used as a form of control.

After basking, just for a while, in the aftermath of the decision for the UK to leave the EU it was announced on the 13th July, that MP for Maidenhead, and Home Secretary Theresa May, has now been elected by her party as the new leader for the Conservative Party, and hence is now officially the new Prime Minister for the UK. She replaces David Cameron who resigned immediately after the Brexit decision was made, and has now stepped down from his role.

The Queen has instructed Theresa May who was also an advocate of remaining in the EU, to form a new government!

It is early days, and although Theresa May has duly appointed David Davis as her new Minister for Brexit, and has promised to swiftly fulfil the UK's decision to exit the EU, unfortunately her track record does not instil very much confidence in some of the electorate. They have significant concerns based on her very changeable views, some of the statements she makes, and the decisions she has made over the years.

Born in 1956, the daughter of an Anglican minister, she seems to have changed some of her once moral votes on certain issues, into a more popular humanistic view of the world.

If the first female Prime Minister for the UK, Margaret Thatcher, was known for her motto "this lady is not for turning" Theresa May is a woman who is known to consistently change her mind on different issues.

Of course, changing your mind, is what any person would say is their 'prerogative'. However, there is a difference with having a change of heart which is based on a revelation of truth, and doing what is right for a country, against changing your mind to go along with an ever changing world.

But isn't this what many leaders do. It is why we quickly distrust and lose all confidence and respect for them? So what is going on?

It seems that double speak, going back on your words, or constantly changing your views, are now the pre-requisite requirements for instigating this cycle of confusion which the world is now falling prey to through every system in society.

In her first speech outside No 10 Downing Street which you can listen to here, she spoke of the 'one nation government' and her pride in unionism, which she intends to continue to promote, where all citizens are treated equally, whoever they are, and wherever they are from. She made no mention of terrorism, which is the main concern of practically every person living in Europe, regardless of their race.

Her speech will have appealed to everyone who is attracted to the idealist philosophy of us all 'being one' and all being treated equally. It sounds good, and it sounds strong; it has a reminiscence of why some people liked belonging in the European Union. Unity and reconciliation are ideals we strive for. However, many people will tell you that the reality of trying to live under those ideals, resulted in them feeling displaced and discarded, and their points of view deemed irrelevant. Many people complained that the spirit promoted under the EU was that it was always implied that people did not know how to make their own decisions. Only those in control knew best.

This has also been defined in the growth of name calling.

Brexit supporters were called poorly educated, thickies, immoral, illiterate, or uneducated losers, calling for a "Little Britain" And that was from politicians! Did those politicians also mean those who have risked their lives in service for their country?

What Love is this?

In essence, it appears people are really being played off against one another indiscriminately by a system which claims to promote fairness and unity, instead of using sensible rationale and time honoured boundaries, with boundaries being the operative word.

Your own individual soul and the soul of a nation can be killed if you 'love' your neighbour in the wrong way and do not retain your own individual conscience and sense of self worth created by this boundary.

Are all leaders' humanistic instigators of reform using us and leading us into an Orwellian nightmare interspersed with glimmers of false hope believing we are heading to heaven on earth, instead of hell on earth with a new breed of love? I hope not. It sounds oppressive. We must therefore still have hope

A one world, one brain, group think, is not really respecting individualism or diversity in its truest sense. If you loose your individualism in servitude to the wrong type of unionism, it is then that you get a 'Little Britain'. Phew....

Loving your Neighbour

Whilst it has been said that the decision to leave the EU was primarily based on the fear and the consequences which have already witnessed from uncontrolled mass immigration, little has been said on the number of legal immigrants and the genuine refugees which the UK have welcomed; something which the UK has always shown genuine compassion towards. Loving your neighbour is now being used as a leverage to instil guilt rather than discernment. When is enough, enough? We have given up our own sense of self worth to serve a wrong master. There is nothing respectful or honourable in doing that for you or for your neighbour.

And whilst Theresa May now launches an independent review into the reported misuse of Sharia law in up to 100 Sharia law courts across the UK; many people have questioned why another form of law which some say is incompatible with British law, is being allowed to run parallel in our country?

From an official government site in relation to the review, she is quoted as saying:

“Many British people of different faiths follow religious codes and practices, and benefit a great deal from the guidance they offer”.

This statement attempts to justify an acceptance of Sharia councils by including all other faiths, but it has raised some outrage by some parliamentary members and also the public.

The review which can take up to 18 months will be looking to see if forced marriages are being legitimised and if divorces issued to women are being dealt with unfairly.

A daily emphasis on Islam, is of course wearing people down predominantly in view of the many terrorist attacks being carried out across the world.

From France, who are our closest neighbors, it is known that Prime Minister Manuel Valls was unceremoniously and loudly booed and jeered recently whilst attending a service in memory of the victims killed in Nice. This was not only as a result of a weak approach in the protection of citizens on the Cote d'Azur, but also from his statement:

“The French people must learn to live with terrorism”

After continuous attacks, this is not what the French people wanted to hear during their time of mourning. Who is writing these speeches?

The BBC reported that the solidarity that the world witnessed after the Charlie Hebdo attack is no longer there anymore. The mood has now changed in France. Verbal attacks on the government are increasing.

There is an awful lot of unrest being created. What people must never do is retaliate physically.

Do Not Love This World.

So how do you build stability in an unstable, argumentative, and mixed up world; where yes means no, evil means good, and good means evil?

In so much as some have mocked the Christian approach of praying for their country and its leaders, and turning back to godly principles; it was also Christian evangelist David Hathaway who first alerted many people about the EU through his well known film called The Rape of Europe, which was made 15 years ago, and has been shown to many people since. There is no arguing that some of the links he has made connect the EU to a new Babylon.

Just one of those links is how Europe takes its name from Europa. In Greek myth Europa was a woman who was raped by Zeus who took the form of a bull. Europa became 'Queen of Heaven' replacing the 'King of Heaven'. The EU regularly uses the image from Revelation 17 of the woman on the beast. You can also see her statue outside the European Parliament building in Strasbourg, a building which also closely resembles the image of the Tower of Babel painted by Pieter Brueghel in 1563. If symbolism is something we should take note of, it is through history and prophecy where we can also find the most reasonable explanations into what is happening in the world today.

However, through observation and common sense alone you can also witness how another world is attempting to transfer itself over the one it should be. You can feel it. You can see it imposing itself upon you. Just like a rapist. Another love is replacing a genuine love. Controversial laws are replacing sensible laws. Injustice is replacing true justice. Fear is replacing hope. Confusion is replacing clear thinking.

If British people benefit from the guidance that belief offers it helps greatly that Christ promised to give perfect peace to those whose minds were stayed on him.

"Peace I leave with you; my peace I give you. I do not give to you as the world gives. Do not let your hearts be troubled and do not be afraid"

This is something really worth striving for and hanging on to in our double speak world.

DOUBLE SPEAK

The term comes from the George Orwell book 1984

War is Peace

Freedom is Slavery

This once busy little market town which was once also part of the thriving centre of the steel industry now resembles one of those Wild West scenes, where, when a stranger comes to town, the people all vanish. It's a town you wouldn't want to visit, or even want to drive through. The shops are boarded up. Litter is strewn across the streets. The buildings are grey, damp and crumbling, and dark hooded figures lurk in the side streets. Who they might be you just cannot tell. It is a world away from the place I once knew.

However, today was different. The sun was shining, the air felt fresher, and somehow this crumbling little town just didn't feel so neglected.

After pulling up at the front of the shop I was visiting, the owner came to quickly unlock the door to let me in. In recent years she has had to lock the door to stop people blatantly walking in and openly stealing her goods. There are no local policemen any more casually walking our streets, once known as the friendly local bobby. You knew their name back then, you saw them daily, and they were well respected. Local councils, once the servant of the people who had voted them in, have slowly and strangely morphed into our new law enforcers. We are answerable to them.

I made a quick dash.....

Inside, were some of the local stalwarts of the community. The ones who never left. They are what you would affectionately call the salt of the earth. They have character. In this particular part of the country they say it as it is. It quickly transpired that the dreaded trip would turn into a conversation of optimism and enthusiasm instead of the usual dark complaints. Here, the place was buzzing with the good news that Brexit had won. The UK was leaving the EU.

One of the men in the shop was an elderly Asian man. He was so excited. "Let's make Britain great again he enthused. I was born and bred here and I want my country back" I wanted to hug him.

There was another man with his young son, and he had a great big beaming smile across his face and sparkling eyes. He looked alive. He couldn't believe, just like me, that the news would be so positive. He was hoping there would be more jobs for British workers, more respect for skilled tradesmen, and more controlled restrictions on immigration.

It had been a long time since I had heard such enthusiasm.

Suddenly, you could sense a genuine feeling of encouragement and independence, yet also a sense of belonging and family, as we all stood there amidst the ruins of the landscape.

For me, there was a restored sense of reassurance as you came to realize that the majority of British people had woken up and wanted to choose their own destiny above the intimidation of a political establishment who they didn't even know. They had been down, but not out. The people had spoken.

In the run up to the referendum, negative propaganda had been consistently used, instead of fact, to instigate fear towards the electorate.

One example was of that surrounding the sad murder and death of MP Jo Cox who was recently killed on a Leeds street by a man with mental health problems. Hailed as a 'hate crime' by some of the media, and a crime that should be fought against, it was apparent that it was being covertly aimed against people who wanted to leave the EU, in relation to Jo Cox's political stance on remaining.

It was very unfortunate that the majority of people who were genuinely sad and shocked by this crime were targeted, for they are also some of the ones who live amidst the reality of the streets where you have to watch your back every day, and where violence and crime are prevalent on a daily basis. They too desperately want hatred to stop. They have seen first hand what happens when your life is controlled by a force you cannot see, protect yourself from, or put a name to.

The Great Divide

In terms of discussing politics, the British can sometimes be quite reserved and secretive. We rarely ask each other who the other is voting for. A bit like religion, it is not the done thing.

But the battle between Brexit and Remain has been different, and people have felt more convicted to vote in this referendum. Never before have I ever heard of so many people passionately and openly put their own personal point across.

At every available opportunity people have been vehemently encouraging each other to either stay or leave the EU, with an emphasis on those who wanted to stay making the most lengthy and I have to say, patronizing of statements, in my own particular view.

Expert opinions abounded from the Remain campaign. Their website featured statements from such people as Stephen Hawking, Richard Branson and Sir Allan Sugar, together with opinions from 150 top scientists and 300 historians. There were also comments from the Director of Europol and numerous world leaders. They included Barrack Obama, Angela Merkel, and my favourite, Bill Clinton.

And who can forget the apparent two finger salute and the abuse that Bob Geldof made to fishermen who were campaigning for Brexit on the River Thames.

In the aftermath of the results they have also been the ones who have immediately and quite openly visibly shown their disappointment and their disbelief. There is a genuine shock wave amongst those who wanted to remain in the EU, together with a genuine surprise from Brexit supporters, that the British voting system actually reflected what people really wanted. Euro scepticism had appeared to lead to scepticism in general that democracy still existed.

Where does the UK go from here?

My own view is that the advocates of remaining in the EU will not quietly go away. It will not end here. Anyone who personally knows what the escape for freedom is internally like will undoubtedly know that in the aftermath of the escape, there will sometimes come some doubt. Whatever has owned you never let's you go that easily. An excellent rendition on what happens next can be watched here by UKIP leader, Nigel Farage.

What happens next in Europe and also in America will be very interesting to watch.

The answer to real freedom of course cannot be totally solved by what political party you happen to belong to. Answers to our own personal imprisonment do not lie here.

However, June 24th, 2016, now called Independence Day, will go down in history and it has been an interesting event to witness and be part of in terms of how the human spirit still strives to retain and value the very real nature of what constitutes freedom from dictatorship, and the genuine unity and respect which can result when people are allowed to live by their own convictions, and finally have their own voices heard.

Disciplined by authority for believing in traditional values

One of my favourite movies is called Hope Floats. It is a modern day scenario which incorporates many of the dilemmas that we all personally face in life. There is the betrayal found in marriage and friendship, there is rejection, there is the cruelty of strangers, and there is the loss of husbands, fathers, friends and parents, all weaved and tightly packed in to 120 minutes of emotional pain. It sounds wonderful doesn't it? But like the sinking of the Titanic, although the ships going down, hope still floats. There is a love element, which is why the movie is also called a chick flick. In this particular story, the man gets his girl, the girl gets her man, the children get parents, and they all move on.

Affairs of the heart sometimes appear like that. Yes, we have to move on, but life often deals with change in a very superficial and romantic way. Happy after afters often leave untold stories of confusion and grief. We have to muster up an awful lot of forgiveness.

People who believe they are in positions of power can be adept at looking over the real harm they create.

With the cultural and social shifts which we witness in attitudes towards marriage, family, gender, religion and abortion, it is clear to see that unless you have the correct information, genuine hope, the willingness to overcome your problems, and a love for doing the right thing, life can step over and crumble so many of those untold stories. Excuse the pun, but you do have to be anchored. Life is changing so quickly that you can be left standing there alone, wondering if anyone truly sees and understands, whilst others merrily wave you on your way.

Yet, there are those who still believe and hang on to such things as the sanctity of traditional marriage and the stability those vows can create for children. There are those who value life. There are those who know that 'feelings' are not the basis on which to build your life, and there are those who stick by those principles and offer a life jacket out to those who will potentially drown. It has nothing to do with prejudice. But it's a risky business.

When someone decides that it is wrong to have traditional beliefs, and worse, penalize and silence people for seeing and living by them; they do not always understand how they themselves are being discriminatory and are being used to destabilize society and hurt others in an attempt to enforce a 'one world' common view. They have been trained to lead and enforce in a wrong way.

It is reported that just two of many people currently being disciplined in the UK for holding on to their traditional views, their individuality, and also their conscience, are Richard Page and Felix Ngole.

Richard Page is a magistrate of 16 years for the county of Kent and has also worked in mental health for 20 years. In 2015, it is reported the Lord Chancellor, Michelle Grove and the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Thomas of Cwmgiedd barred Mr Page from sitting as a Magistrate after he had expressed his traditional views on marriage and his belief that it was in the best interests of a child to be placed in a traditional family setting rather than with a same-sex couple.

Mr Page is quoted as saying "This is not a matter of prejudice or bigotry but is based on knowledge and evidence that I have applied when seeking the best interests for a lifetime of a vulnerable child"

Felix Ngole is a Christian student who has been expelled from the University of Sheffield after he expressing his support for American, Kim Davies in a face book discussion in which he explained biblical teaching on sexual ethics. It is reported that; The Faculty of Social Sciences Fitness to Practice Committee for the university ruled that he should be removed from the course. This has meant he will no longer be able to pursue his chosen vocation as a social worker.

You can read more through The Christian Legal Centre who are assisting in both of the ongoing cases. [Link 1], [Link 2]

They are but a small reflection of how certain ethical standards outside the enforced 'new normal' ones, are being marginalized and ostracized in education, the workplace and also within religion, in the pursuit towards this collective vision. True individuals are having to stand alone whilst society becomes re-wired.

As society sinks into an abyss of one world thinking, all individual and intuitive reasoning's may become lost, unless we speak up about certain values which need to be saved.

Women and Children First

Hope Floats popped up again most recently when I was introduced to the story of country singers Rory and Joey Feek via the writings of Rory Feek called This Life I Live. He writes that he wants to be the best man he can be.

In one of his articles Rory happened to reveal how his wife Joey, who was dying with cancer, also loved the film. His blog has been followed by many who have witnessed the grace and the dedication of a family living under the prognosis of a terminal illness.

Now that Rory is a single parent, and also a widower, he continues to write his story. It is very encouraging. With a young child to look after, he states that he made a few mistakes in the past with his other children, but he loves being given another chance to be a good father.

Here in the UK there are over 400,000 families reported as being headed by single fathers, just like him. Many of them will also be widowers. It can only be a biased system that chooses to edify the struggle of the single mother at the expense of the many fathers who love and raise their children too. But we hear so little about them.

Why.

This is only the tip of the ice berg in relation to the millions of untold stories experienced by many men who long to be fathers, and who have also been side-lined from having any say in the outcome of their unborn child. The popular belief that it is men that usually encourage women to have abortions may be viewed differently if people could hear the testimonies about the grief that is experienced by many men as their vision of fatherhood dies. You can read one of those stories here.

This together with the mental health issues and the regrets which some women report after having had an abortion often escapes our attention. They need our help. They too have been marginally silenced in order that authoritarians can further another agenda.

And whilst the British Pregnancy Advisory Service, (the BPAS) who are Britain's largest abortion provider, campaign for the decriminalization of abortion up until the birth of a child for any reason, it is very troubling to hear that they are being supported by Cathy Warwick Chief Executive and General Secretary of the Royal College of Midwives, who it is reported is also a trustee of the BPAS. In setting the record straight against a backlash of criticism from the public and from the midwives she is meant to represent, she confirms that the RCM are supporting the 'We Trust Women' campaign which is headed by the BPAS. You can read what Cathy Warwick has to say in her own words here: [Link 1], [Link 2]

So, Does Hope still Float?

Boat Lift – The Untold Story

Vincent Ardolino, captain of Amberjack V, could not stand by and watch other people suffer on the morning of September 11th. He took part in one of the biggest sea evacuations in maritime history.

Boat Lift is not a story of romance, but it is a true story of morally doing the right thing. The story does not incorporate political correctness, discrimination or bigotry. Like Hope Floats it incorporates some fear, but primarily it focuses on saving lives.

It is reported the evacuation was bigger than the evacuation of Dunkirk and from one phone call hundreds of boats intuitively ascended upon the island of Manhattan and did all they could to evacuate 500,000 people from the thick black smoke which had engulfed the island. That's the spirit.....

It is such an inspiring story and speaks of intuition, courage and compassion. In comparison to the culture of destroying people it is encouraging that people can still live by their instincts to do everything that they can to save the lives of others. Life is very valuable.

Do you not know that you are God's temple and that God's Spirit dwells in you? If anyone destroys God's temple, God will destroy him. For God's temple is holy, and you are that temple. –1 Corinthians 3: 16-17

To quote the Fuhrer, “When an opponent declares: ‘I will not come over to your side,’ I calmly say ‘your child belongs to me already. Who are you? You will pass on. Your descendants, however, now stand in the new camp. In a short time they will know nothing but this new community.’” –Roberts, Craig; The Medusa File, Consolidated Press International; Tulsa, OK; 1997; p 90.

A so-called terror

- “The world is a dangerous place to live, not because of the people who are evil, but because of the people who don’t do anything about it.” -Albert Einstein

- “Never open the door to a lesser evil, for other and greater ones invariably slink in after it.” -Baltasar Graciin

- “Tolerance becomes a crime when applied to evil.” -Thomas Mann

I am guilty of living under a so-called awareness of danger.

When I see men congregating on the street, I cross to the other side of the road. When evening comes, I tightly deadlock my doors. And where once, I would take an evening stroll to the shops, I now only drive. But I have found out I am not alone. Other people, and especially the women I know, are now exercising the same sort of excessive caution. There is a strange silent curfew sweeping over this once pleasant land.

In the same vein that fathers would meet their children, when the nights drew dark and they were late coming home; many husbands, boyfriends and fathers are also stepping up their watch.

And despite the re-assurance that our safety is of paramount importance, extra CCTV cameras just aren't cutting it for the sensibly minded. They are not personally there. They watch from a distance, cruelly recording and playing back the horror and the nightmare of the atrocities being carried out on the street against the unarmed, and the unprotected victim.

Travelling alone, public transport, gap years for student children, are all becoming very cautious and careful considerations if you are travelling to and from a city. These are the secret comments that I recently listened to, expressed by old and younger women alike. You could literally watch the seeds of resentment growing.

Are we the victims of an agenda of perpetrated fear mongering or is our so called awareness of our so-called terror, based on reality?

There is most definitely a lot of confusion which is most certainly being perpetuated by the mainstream media.

The recent suicide bombings in Brussels Zaventem Airport and Maalbeek metro station, which some say may possibly have been planned to coincide with the Easter holidays, were consistently reported and emphasized as being carried out by a 'so-called' Islamic state. What did they mean?

Were the terrorists connected to Islam or weren't they?

Demonstrations which later transpired on the streets of Brussels were un-hesitatingly labelled as being carried out by far-right protestors and hooligans, dressed in black, wearing masks, and making Nazi salutes.

From the photographs printed, you can see the odd mask being worn were those replicating the mask used in the film V for Vendetta. You can watch the revolutionary speech from the film here.

Were some of the demonstrators objecting to the actions of a government who they believe have allowed the crimes of fear, terrorism and displacement to infiltrate their country? It is reported the crowd were also shouting anti-migrant slogans.

It is the writer's thoughts that there was certainly a frustration between watching the peaceful solidarity shown in the unity of races, exhibited outside the Bourse in Brussels, and the unity expressed after the Charlie Hebdo demonstration in Paris; which did nothing to stop a further attack which was later carried out on the Bataclan concert hall in Paris.

The political correctness which also demands a silent obedient consent may also be at the root cause of a frustrated crowd who are now being used to almost distract attention away from the real perpetrators of a much more sinister evilness.

Terrorism and Assaults in the UK

Of course terrorism and assaults have always occurred in the UK. The 1975 IRA bombings on the Rotunda building in the city centre of Birmingham, England, awoke my particular generation to an era of bomb threats, bag searching, and regular evacuations from both schools and shopping centres. There was a time it was common place to hear of the 'troubles' as we called them. It was acknowledged and spoken about openly. The terror from across the sea in Ireland had come closer to home.

The UK also has a very bad history of hooliganism within the sport of football. Saturday's in major towns and cities were once dangerous no-go areas. If you wanted trouble, you could always expect a punch-up on a football day. Elton John even sang a song about Saturdays. 'Saturday Nights all right for Fighting'.

These days football is more about the offence created by 'name calling'.

Rough and deprived areas have also always existed in every suburb of a city, where you know your level of awareness usually signals some extra 'caution'. But no-one has ever been so blind as to know that abuse and violence can, and do happen anywhere. Alongside terrorism there is a growing culture of out of control alcoholism and drug addiction out there.

However, we now face a different type of assault. You cannot fail to sense and see it spreading – everywhere. It is not predominantly confined to football stadiums, late night city nightclubs, or the seedy side of town.

People are very afraid of Islam, and they are highly suspicious of strangers until they know them. They do not know who is who in the towns and the cities. They are afraid of the increased attacks that they now see being carried out by some of the migrants they are helping, and they are also tired and frustrated with the cultural acceptance which they feel forced to adhere to.

Should they be the ones to be made to feel guilty, or are they just exercising common sense.

Individually, people hover between the friendship and the peace they would want, against the scale and the intensity of the atrocities we hear about and now physically see and experience on a daily basis.

Germany after the sex attacks: fences are going up and the mood is ugly

Live and Let Live!

Perhaps some of the most challenging misconceptions that we ever have to deal with are the thoughts that many people have on co-existence. There are many emotionally charged ideals being circulated on how we should love and care for each other. Some of these are being promoted through religion and some through humanism. They are not exercising common sense. We do not live in an ideal world and evil does not play by the same rules.

And when humanists point out that religion is the cause of all wars it is sometimes good to also point out that world wide atrocities which have killed millions, have been carried out by communist regimes and dictatorships. This also does not account for those who have died believing that you can live a healthy life with no moral values. How millions of people die under the freedom of doing what they choose is a whole different story.

Responding with Light

So, by chance I was travelling within an area known as the Wye Valley on Good Friday and happened to stop at a small village. It was just a little bit off the beaten track. Tucked away, it had about four shops, and three inns. It was one of those quaint quintessential niches in England, which I love to find and the type of place where everyone knows each other. I daresay though it still had its own problems behind the closed doors.

As with all British villages there was also the local church, in this case it was the 12th century church of St. Casians.

For a short while I sat in the porch of the church, as though sitting in the parlour, waiting, the door ajar looking out over the green fields dotted with clusters of daffodils.

Just behind me I realized there was a huge cross. It was painted with red marks, indicating blood and sacrifice, and there were blood stained ropes tied to the wooden arms.

Next to it was another huge cross, this time adorned with flowers.

The crosses were obviously being used in an enactment of the crucifixion and the resurrection for the Easter weekend.

But everyone had gone home now, it was late afternoon and the crosses just stood there, waiting. Did I exercise some caution of my aloneness in this seemingly peaceful place. Yes I did.

I thought about how Christ had stood alone amidst the brutality of the day knowing what was coming. How the crowds had been emotionally manipulated and swayed to vote for Barabbas, and how the truth would be crucified.

My own discovery has been that Christ never made friends or accepted that which was wrong or evil. He never compromised himself or acted weak and in submission to abuse. He knew who was who, what was what.

When death comes, believers and non believers all lay flowers and light candles to bring back light and beauty into dark places. They act as tokens of remembrance to someone we have lost.....

A strong wind blew through the porch of St Casian's, the door was still ajar; it had gone chilly outside and the skies were turning grey.

Will the UK and the rest of Europe find light, which is the truth, in this darkness amidst all its fears?

British children manipulated and robbed of their innocence

Through a Glass Darkly

The American philosopher and pragmatist William James, wrote: "Whenever two people meet there are really six people present. There is each man as he sees himself, each man as the other person sees him, and each man as he really is".

If you look through this type of lens, you could say there are really more people in that meeting if you honestly looked. For behind each person, male or female, is the artist; the creator of the true color's of that person, and along the way are all the people who have impressed their own idea's, color's and distortions into how 'they' want themselves and others to be created and painted, according to their own perception or agenda.

Currently, British schoolchildren are being heavily targeted and 'used' to reform society. Losing their genuine creative ability and the gift to see for themselves, they are having their minds which are connected to the optical lens seriously played with. This was illustrated in a recent survey carried out by the Office of the Children's Commissioner for England who recently distributed a questionnaire to schoolchildren in Brighton and Hove.

The questionnaire asked the children, aged from 13 – 18 to choose from over 20 gender options on how it best described their gender, to include: Tomboy, Trans boy, Gender fluid, Agender, Androgynous, Bi-gender, Non-binery, Gender queer, Gender non conforming, Tri gender, In the middle of boy and girl, Intersex.

If like me, you have never heard of these terms, other than Tomboy, (being used as a pre-cursor for the acceptance of the other terms) you can only imagine the type of identity crisis and confusion you would experience when you are just 13, in relation to the suggestion that you should fall into one of these categories.

In an article from the Telegraph it read that the head teacher from one of the schools said:

"We want all our young people to feel comfortable with who they are, to understand that the notion of gender can go beyond the traditional idea of simply being either male and female, and to recognise that people can use a range of terms to describe their gender identity." [Link]

It is reported that the survey was later withdrawn for amendments, yet not abolished, after the Children's Commissioner, Anne Longfield received complaints.

Permanent Markers and Masterpieces

The problem with labels, thoughts and feelings, is that they are terribly hard to shake off once you have accepted their distortion of reality. Labels can be the reason that a lot of people never reach their full potential, and why some people live a life that eventually destroys them.

The Persistence of Memory

When the artist Salvador Dali was just 5 years old, it is said his parents took him to the grave of his older brother, who was also called Salvador, and had been just 9 months older than him. They told him he was his brother's reincarnation and from then on Salvador Dali believed that his brother lived inside him. It is reported he said "(We) resembled each other, but we had different reflections".

Most of his paintings reflect the distortions of his mind, which were considered by some to be very depraved.

Who was Salvador Dali? It is reported that Dali may have attempted to take his own life on several occasions.

Les Demoiselles d'Avignon

One of Picasso's famous sayings was "Painting is a blind man's profession. He paints not what he sees, but what he feels, what he tells himself about what he has seen."

The artist Pablo Picasso is also known for his abandonment of the traditional human form in his paintings. People who knew him say his personality was dualistic; he could be kind and also extremely cruel and sadistic. People who knew him were often overwhelmed and took over completely by his personality.

Picasso also believed that "reality should be torn apart".

They are words that are reflective of someone who is in competition and conflict with Creation and a Creator.

Monuments to an alternative God

In contrast to natural creation, strange, ugly and distorted monuments and murals have been springing up all over the UK, adding to the unusual symbolism which often goes un-noticed in some of the more traditional buildings and pieces of art. In some cases the meaningless art appears to be commissioned by local authorities who should be spending money on more vital services.

Distorted animals called superlamanana are strange sculptures that have been appearing all over Liverpool. They are intended to be a representation of a cross between a banana and a lamb. There is The Willow Man in Bridgewater, Somerset, the largest willow figure in the UK, meant to represent the willow industry of the area but identical to the Wicker man effigies used by ancient druids for pagan sacrifice. I have passed this sculpture many times and it is a disturbing distraction located alongside the main M5 motorway where most tourists travel to holiday destinations.

In Plymouth, there is a large ugly sculpture of a mythical sea creature nicknamed The Prawn on the Barbie, located near The Barbican Centre in the place where the Pilgrim Fathers left for their pilgrimage to America. In Illframcombe in Devon, there is Verity, created by Damien Hurst who refers to his work as a modern allegory of truth and justice. The statue is of a pregnant woman holding a sword and standing on a pile of law books and is reported to be the largest sculpture in the UK. The sculpture shows the internal anatomy of the woman with the foetus visible. The face is ugly, and part of the leg is peeled away. It is a disturbing piece of work located on a beautiful landscape. [Link]

What is the point of all of these disturbing images and is it any coincidence that it is becoming impossible to avoid being exposed to such disturbing imagery and altered perceptions?

If beauty is in the eye of the beholder we are fast losing our eyesight to all that was truly created beautiful. Though ugly, all of the new perceptions and imagery we now see somehow possess spiritual symbolism within them confusing and distorting the truth of who we really are.

Reformist's who are pretending to care about children, do not care about them at all. They are using them.

Will we wake up in time to see the colours being painted over people and places which were meant to be as beautiful as illustrated in the Psalm 139: 14. You are fearfully and wonderfully made. Or will we accept the signature mark of 'The Distorter' upon the human psyche and landscape? [YouTube Video]

Note: A beautiful painting called The Sun was painted in 1909. It is a painting of a sun-covered sky and it is described as all-pervasive, shining from the heavens upon land and sea, reaching out to all eternity, pure in image, intense. It was painted by Edward Munch who painted The Scream in 1893.

Were glimpses of heaven given to Edward Munch who was disturbed by horrifying visions and nightmares. I wonder.
