

Did the people in Orlando deserve to die?

Once again we find ourselves falling into an age-old trap. If you ask the wrong question you will find yourself giving the wrong answer. That happens so much to Christians who try to explain the ways of God.

He warned us about that, you know. "My ways are not your ways" the scriptures tell us. Yet we often find ourselves trying to explain the unexplainable to those who can never understand.

"Did those homosexuals that were killed in that night club deserve to die? What kind of God would permit that to happen?" These questions and others similar in their mystery are reverberating around the crumbling walls of the American culture.

Few have the correct...or may I say acceptable...answers...at least not the answers that the unbelieving world is looking for. No one can ever explain why something does, or does not happen. As the Beach Boys famously sang back in the mid-sixties...God Only Knows.

And sometimes that is the only answer we are left with. Some things, truly, only God knows.

But perhaps we are asking the wrong question. Rather than asking if they deserved to die perhaps we would find more solace in the answer to the question "Did they deserve to live?" Does anyone deserve to live? If so, why? If we deserve to live, who says so? Could it be that the question should not be who deserves to die but who deserves to live.

If we get serious about answering that question perhaps some of our confusion will go away.

We are taught by the secular world that life is random. We pooch pooch the idea of a Creator who serves as the Grantor of all life and live our lives as if we are the captain of our own ship. If life is random and nothing more than chance, then based on what principle does anyone or anything deserve to live?

If there is no order to life and if there is no Creator of all life then who is to say that some deranged Muslim with a gun doesn't have the right to end a life? Based on what moral standard does anything deserve to live? Survival of the fittest is the law of the jungle.

Is it wrong for a fox to kill and eat a rabbit? Is it wrong for a zoo keeper to kill a Gorilla? Is it wrong for the President to order the death of a peasant in the hills of Afghanistan? What makes the killing of a homosexual wrong? Who determines who lives and who dies? Who makes the call about which life is worthy of being lived and which life isn't? What makes ANY death a tragedy?

The question is not does someone deserve to die...the question is does anyone deserve to live?

Survival of the fittest is the measuring stick in the animal world. If we have merely "evolved" from our animal friends, then who makes the determination that any form of life is more valuable than another? Perhaps all people are truly nothing more and nothing less than a food source. Some people eat animals and some animals eat people. Some creatures live and some creatures die. Life is random.

What in nature would leave you to believe that anyone deserves to live...

My Christian faith teaches me that

- All have sinned and fallen short of the Glory of God
- It is appointed unto man once to die.
- There are none righteous, no not one.

We all die. Every one of us. None of us can pick the time, the place, or the method. But you can rest assured that we all have an appointment with death. That is the price of sin...the wages...death.

Again, why does anyone “deserve” to live?

In a world where mothers are permitted to choose death for their unborn babies what makes it wrong when a homosexual Muslim determines that some folks in a night club in Orlando deserve post birth abortions?

The denial of God has consequences.

What makes murder wrong? If life is random and simply a matter of chance why all of the outrage when someone's number comes up? Life is a lottery...a game of chance. What is so wrong with that?

Sometimes you get the bear and sometimes the bear gets you.

On the same day 49 born people's lives were ended by a gunman in Orlando 500 unborn lives were ended by “doctors” in “medical clinics.” In both cases the person who died had no “choice” in the time or means of their slaughter.

Abortion is bullying. Abortion is terrorism. Terror in the womb leads to terrorism in the world.

Did the people in Orlando deserve to die? Do unborn babies deserve to die?

It seems to me that we are asking the wrong question.
